FOREWORD

The workmen's compensation laws have not been fully and completely utilized. One of the contributing factors has been the lack of familiarity with the provisions of the law on the part of the workers.

Today, more than ever before, it is important that the worker should know what his rights are and what he should do to safeguard them if he is injured in his employment.

Mindful of the workers' problem in this regard, the United Steelworkers of America, through its General Counsel, Arthur J. Goldberg, and Edward G. Nassar, Workmen's Compensation Department, have prepared this booklet, outlining the Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation Law, to serve as a ready handbook of reference. This handbook is provided by the United Steelworkers as a service to our members in Wisconsin, who are disabled or may be disabled in the course of employment so as to guide and assist them in complying with the requirements of the Workmen's Compensation Laws in Wisconsin so that they will eventually obtain the various benefits to which they are entitled under the Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation Law.

INTRODUCTION

The State of Wisconsin was one of the first states in the Union to adopt a Workmen's Compensation Law. It was enacted in 1911, and went into effect immediately. Prior to that time the only remedy available to an injured worker was a suit in court.

This "remedy" was too frequently no remedy at all. The cost of court proceedings was often prohibitive. Technical defenses were often successfully used to prevent recovery of damages. It frequently took many years before a judgment could be obtained and collected, if at all.

The underlying aim of Workmen's Compensation Laws is to make the cost of industrial accidents, injuries, disabilities, and deaths, regardless of their causes, a charge upon industry which ultimately passes it on to the consumer as part of the cost of its product.

Although the Workmen's Compensation Law has been a great benefit to workers, it has fallen far short of attaining the ideal solution of the problem of injured and disabled employees and their dependents.

In the original Act passed in 1911, the compensation paid was small, the waiting period was long and the restrictions were many. But, at every session of the legislature, organized labor in Wisconsin kept pegging away with amendments and suggestions.

In every session since 1911 up to and including 1941, amendments improving and liberalizing the law were enacted, until at present Wisconsin has one of the most liberal Workmen's Compensation laws in the United States.

Organized labor is still not satisfied, and will continue its constant and consistent attempts to improve the law, to bring it nearer to a real solution of the problem.

It was presumably the intention of the framers of the law to make the remedy so simple that an employee would not be obliged to have any knowledge of its provisions or to retain an attorney in order to safe-guard his rights under it; but employers and insurers have, in the past, raised such highly technical and confusing interpretations that only too frequently an expert is necessary to win a contested compensation case.

The purpose of this pamphlet is to advise the worker of his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Law of Wisconsin, and what he should do to guard them. It must, necessarily, be general in its nature, serving as a guide in situations most commonly arising under the Act. Specific questions cannot be covered, nor can it be stated with assurance that the present interpretations of any provision will not be altered by future decisions.

When you have a specific problem about which you are doubtful, CONSULT YOUR COMMITTEEMAN.

If your right to compensation has been denied by your employer, don't accept his decision as final, CONSULT YOUR ATTORNEY.

General Counsel.

When You Are Hurt

1. Report the injury and accident IMMEDIATELY to your foreman, first aid man, or directly to your employer.
2. Demand workmen's compensation IMMEDIATELY from your employer.
3. Report the injury and accident IMMEDIATELY to your Committeeman or other appropriate Union representative.
4. Do NOT make any statement in writing to your employer. Just report the injury and accident to him.
5. Get the names and addresses of all persons who saw the accident, and obtain a statement in writing from them.
6. Give a copy of this information to your Committeeman. Keep the original yourself.
7. If you cannot do these things yourself, ask your Committeeman to do them for you.
8. Do not sign any papers in blank. Show any papers offered to you to your Committeeman or to your family before signing them.

9. KNOW YOUR RIGHTS. Do not accept your employer's decision as to whether you are or are not entitled to compensation. CONSULT YOUR UNION.

COVERAGE

1. Q Are all employees covered by the workmen's compensation law?

A No. Employees excepted from the compensation act are farm laborers, domestic servants and employees working for any person or corporation who usually employs less than three (3) employees. Also members of a partnership.

1½. Q Are members of the National and State Guards covered?

A Yes, when in state service performing official duty under direction of appropriate authority, but only in case federal laws, rules or regulations provide no benefits substantially equivalent to those herein provided.

2. Q Does an employee have any right to elect he shall not come under the act?

A With the exception of epileptics, persons totally blind and corporation officials, employees have no right to elect not to come under the act.

3. Q If any employer is subject to the act, can I sue him in a court of law for damages for an accidental injury sustained in my employment instead of taking workmen's compensation?

A No. Your sole remedy against the employer is under the compensation act.

4. Q If my employer comes under the act, what guarantee is there that he will pay workmen's compensation?

A All employers employing more than three (3) persons must either:

1. Insure payment of such compensation in some insurance company authorized to insure such liability in this state.
2. Show to the Industrial Commission his financial ability to pay such compensation according to law, whereupon the Commission may, upon written order, make such exemptions.

5. Q If my injury at work is caused by the negligence of a third party, can I sue him?

A Yes. Such action does not affect in any way your right to compensation but if you secure a judgment against a third party, the employer is entitled to be repaid the amount he has paid you in compensation, up to two-thirds of the net proceeds of the action.

6. Q How are the proceeds recovered against a third party applied?

A Entire proceeds less cost of collection shall be divided: one-third to the employee, remaining balance to the employer or carrier as far as necessary to reimburse for compensation benefits, and any remaining sum to the employee.

7. Q Are employers or workmen's compensation carriers reimbursed for increased compensation payments out of third party settlements?

A No such payments are eliminated. These increased compensation payments are penalties for delayed payments (either 5% after an order of the commission or 10% for inexcusable delay); 15% because of violation of a safety order, and double or treble compensation paid because of employment of a minor without required permit or at prohibited employment.

8. Q When does the employee have additional time to file suit against a third party and its insurance carrier?

A Where the insurer of the employer and third party are the same or where there is common control of the insurer of each, and the insurer fails to commence a third party action or to file statutory notice of claim, the two (2) year statute within which notice of injury to the person must be served (notice to be given in case of personal injury suit) shall not be pleaded as a bar in any action commenced by the injured employee against such third party subsequent to two (2) years from the date of injury but prior to six (6) years from such date.

II

COMPENSABLE INJURIES

9. Q For what injuries can I recover compensation?

A You may recover for:

(a) Any injury arising out of and in the course of your employment, that causes a wage loss.

10. Q If I sustain an injury while at work, am I always entitled to workmen's compensation?

A No. An injury must arise both out of and in the course of your employment. For instance, if you are struck by a fellow employee because he was angry at you for some personal reason not connected with your work, your injury did not arise out of your employment even though it happened in the course of your employment and you would not collect compensation; however, if you were struck under the same circumstances because of a quarrel concerning your work such as who should run a certain machine, then your injury would arise both out of and in the course of your employment and you would collect compensation.

11. Q Are there any circumstances in which I can recover workmen's compensation if I am not working at the moment the injury occurs?

A Yes. If your injury happens while you are subject to your employer's orders and directions, for example; compensation has been awarded to an employee who sustained an injury during his lunch hour, in his employer's plant or in a parking lot furnished by the employer and under the latter's control; to an employee who slipped and fell in the yard of his employer while leaving after work; and to a traveling salesman who was hurt in a fire in a hotel where he was stopping overnight while on a business trip for his employer.

12. Q If my injury is the result of my own carelessness, am I still entitled to workmen's compensation?

A Yes. Carelessness alone will not prevent you from getting compensation.

13. Q If I am drinking on the job and get hurt, am I entitled to compensation?

A Yes. Drunkenness alone will not prevent you from getting compensation. But where the injury results from the intoxication of the employee, the compensation and death benefits provided shall be reduced 15%.

14. Q What act of mine will prevent me from getting compensation?

A There are two situations in which you cannot recover compensation. They are:

(a) If you purposely injure yourself.

15. Q What do you mean by intentional and wilful misconduct?

A By that is meant you wilfully and intentionally exposed yourself to the danger involved knowing that you were almost certain to get hurt. However, if your foreman has permitted you to expose yourself to the prohibited danger in the past, then you may still collect compensation.

III

NOTICE

16. Q What is the FIRST thing I must do when I am hurt at work?

A When you are hurt, do the following:

(a) Report the injury and accident IMMEDIATELY to your foreman, the first aid man, or directly to your employer. Be sure to give him all the details concerning your accident and all the details concerning your injury.

(b) Report the injury and accident IMMEDIATELY to your Committeeman or other appropriate Union representative.

(c) Get the names and addresses of all persons who saw the accident, and obtain a statement in writing from them.

(d) Give a copy of this information to your Committeeman. Keep the original yourself.

(e) If you cannot do these things yourself, ask your Committeeman to do them for you.

17. Q Does this Notice have to be in writing or in special form?

A No. It may be oral, but it must inform the employer of both the accident and the injury.

18. Q What information shall I give when I report the accident?

A Give all the information about the accident and the injury. Describe how the accident happened and tell about all its effects in detail. For instance, if you fell down and fractured your arm and slightly injured your back as well, tell how the accident happened and report both the arm and back injuries. See that the person who takes down the information writes down everything you tell him.

19. Q If my employer asks me to sign the paper upon which this information is being taken down, shall I sign it?

A No.

20. Q What is the result of my failure to report ALL my injuries?

A You may be denied compensation for the disability resulting from those injuries of which your employer did not have notice.

21. Q Suppose I receive injuries but am not aware of them?

A In that case report them as soon as you become aware of them.

22. Q To whom must I give this notice?

A Give such Notice to your employer himself; or to the agent of your employer who is your superior, such as your foreman or superintendent; or to an agent of your employer whose job it is to receive such information, such as first aid man, factory doctor, or Compensation Department employee in the plant.

Get the full name of person to whom you give this notice and keep it.

23. Q If I am hurt too badly to give Notice, what shall I do?

A Have someone else, such as your Committeeman or a member of your family, give notice for you.

24. Q Shall I report an injury even if it is a small one?

A Yes, be sure to do so. Many serious ailments develop from minor injuries. It is most important that you report ALL accidents, no matter how insignificant they may seem to you at the moment.

25. Q How long do I have after the accidental injury to notify my employer of it?

A You have 30 days after the date of the injury in which to give Notice to your employer, but it is best to notify him IMMEDIATELY.

26. Q If I fail to give Notice within the proper time, am I entitled to compensation?

A Failure to give Notice may prevent you from obtaining compensation unless your employer has otherwise had Notice or knowledge of your accident.

27. Q What do you mean by that last statement?

A Even though neither you nor someone acting for you has given Notice to your employer, if he nevertheless receives the information about your accident from any source whatsoever, the receipt by him of such information is sufficient notice. Absence of notice shall not bar recovery if it was found there was no intention to mislead the employer and he was not misled thereby.

28. Q If my employer carries insurance, must I notify his insurance company?

A No. The law requires only that you notify your employer.

29. Q If I notify the insurance company, not my employer, what happens?

A You may lose your right to compensation, so be sure to notify your employer.

30. Q How can I prove that I have given Notice?

A Always be sure to keep a record of every time you discuss your accident or compensation for it with your employer.

IV

STATEMENTS

31. Q Do I have to make a statement in writing to my employer or his insurer?

A The law does not require you to make a written statement, or to sign anything. The giving of notice of your injury to your employer is sufficient.

32. Q Why shouldn't I give a statement in writing to my employer?

A In a number of cases in the past certain employers and their insurance companies have used the device of taking statements for the purpose of building up a defense to the worker's just claim for compensation. Too often the statement becomes a description of what the employer would like to have happened instead of what actually did occur. Sometimes this is done by failing to question the worker as to important details of the accident, sometimes by not writing in all the facts given by the injured worker, and sometimes by actually changing the answers. Remember, the statement is primarily for the benefit of the employer.

33. Q How will my employer then be able to decide whether or not I am entitled to compensation?

A After you have given notice to the employer of your injury, it is the duty of the employer, himself, to make whatever investigation he desires, and from that determine your right to compensation benefits.

34. Q Suppose I nevertheless wish to make a statement, what shall I do to protect myself?

A Do the following:

(a) Be sure that the statement contains your entire story in your exact words and is not just a summary of your story made by the person who takes the information;

(b) Before signing it, take the statement with you and show it to your Committeeman, or a member of your family, or your Union attorney, so that you may be certain it contains all the true facts of your case;

(c) Be sure to read it over carefully before signing it;

(d) Ask the employer for a copy of the statement, keep it for your files.

Do not do the following:

(b) Do not answer questions about matters not directly concerned with your accident, such as citizenship, etc.

DEMAND

35. Q After my employer has had notice of my injury, is there anything further I must do in order to collect compensation?

A Yes. You must make an application for adjustment of claim under Workmen's Compensation Act. The Industrial Commission furnishes a printed blank for the asking.

36. Q What must I do with this application?

A The original application and two copies for the respondent must be mailed to the Industrial Commission, Madison, Wis.

37. Q Must I use this form?

A Unless you have made agreement with your employer or his insurance company as to the amount of compensation you are to receive, then you must use this form.

38. Q When must I make application for adjustment of compensation?

A Such application must be filed within two years from the date of the injury or from the date that the employee or his dependents knew or ought to have known the nature of the disability and its relation to the employment.

If no payment of compensation is made and no application filed with the Commission within two years, the right to compensation is barred, unless employer knew or should have known, within the two year period, that the employee had sustained the injury on which claim is based.

Applications in all events must be filed within six (6) years from the date of injury or last payment of compensation regardless of knowledge of the employer.

39. Q Are the periods of limitation extended in the cases of ~~minority~~, minors, insanity or absence in military service?

A If a claimant is under 21 years of age at the time of injury or at the time his right accrues, the time for filing application or otherwise proceeding under the act is extended to one (1) year after the claimant attains the age of 21 years. If within any part of the last year of any such period of limitation an employee, his personal representative or surviving dependent be insane or on active duty in the Armed Forces of the United States, the period of limitation shall be extended to two (2) years after the time it would otherwise expire. Where a federal statute protects a person on active duty in the Armed Forces of the United States, the provision of the act does not apply to him.

40. Q If I am killed as a result of my injury, who must make the application?

A Your dependents.

41. Q If my employer keeps me at light work, shall I make application for adjustment?

A If you are not satisfied with the compensation you are receiving or have received for the injury, then you should make application.

42. Q Suppose my disability shows up three years after the accident, can I then make application for adjustment?

A If no compensation has been paid to you for the injury, you are barred from compensation. If compensation has been paid to you for the injury and a further disability shows up you can then make application for adjustment when you discover such added disability.

43. Q Suppose I can't make application because I am hurt too badly to do so?

A If the injury prevents you from making application because of physical or mental disability, your period of incapacity is not counted as being part of the two year period.

44. Q If I have not made application for compensation of my employer in time, do I lose my right to compensation?

A Yes. But since there are so many exceptions to the general rule it is best you consult your attorney about it.

VI

BENEFITS

45. Q For what injuries do I get compensation?

A (a) Your disability to earn full wages.

46. Q Suppose the injury disfigures me but does not disable me, am I entitled to compensation?

A If you, the employee, are so permanently disfigured about the face, head, neck, hand or arm as to occasion potential loss of wage, the commission may allow such sum for compensation thereof, as it may deem just, not exceeding your average annual earnings as defined.

47. Q If my injury causes me pain and discomfort but I am still able to work, am I entitled to compensation?

A No. Pain and discomfort in themselves do not entitle you to compensation. However, if the pain and discomfort becomes so intense that you cannot work, then you are entitled to compensation.

48. Q When does my compensation start?

A If the injury causes disability, compensation shall be due and payable on the fourth calendar day, exclusive of Sundays, after you leave work as a result of the injury, except that if the disability shall not continue longer than 10 calendar days from the date you leave work as a result of the injury no indemnity whatever shall be recoverable for the first three calendar days.

49. Q When must my employer make these payments to me?

A They must be made within one week after they are due.

50. Q If I am sick or diseased when hired and the accident makes my condition worse or brings it to a head or causes it to flare up, am I entitled to compensation?

A With respect to your injuries, your employer hires you as you are and must pay compensation if you are injured at work even though your previous condition contributed toward that disability.

51. Q Can my workmen's compensation be garnisheed or attached?

A No. Workmen's compensation is not subject to the claims of your creditors; nor is it subject to State or Federal income tax.

52. Q Does the fact that I am paid for my injuries from the proceeds of an insurance policy prevent me from obtaining workmen's compensation for it?

A No.

TOTAL DISABILITY

53. Q What is total disability?

A Total disability is a disability which prevents you from earning any money at some occupation. It does not mean that you are unable to get around or do some things about the house.

54. Q If I am totally disabled as a result of an accident, how much compensation do I get?

A You get 70% of your actual weekly wage but not more than $54.00 per week nor less than $8.75 per week during such total disability.

55. Q If I am totally and permanently disabled, what compensation do I get?

A You receive your weekly compensation as long as you live.

56. Q What is total permanent disability?

A Total blindness of both eyes or the loss of both arms at or near the shoulder or of both legs at or near the hips or of one arm at the shoulder and one leg at the hip. This enumeration is not exclusive but in other cases the Industrial Commission shall find the facts.

57. Q What is meant by average weekly wage?

A The average weekly earnings for temporary disability shall be taken at not less than $12.50 nor more than $77.14 and for permanent disability or death, shall be taken at not less than $20.00 nor more than $77.14, and for permanent partial disability at not less than $20.00 nor more than $57.14. Between these limits the average weekly earnings shall be determined as follows:

The average weekly earnings shall be arrived at by multiplying the daily earnings by the number of days and fractional days normally worked per week at the time of the injury in the business operation of the employer for the particular employment in which the employee was employed at the time of this injury.

58. Q How long does my compensation run in case of total disability?

A As long as the total disability continues.

PARTIAL DISABILITY

59. Q What is partial disability?

A Partial disability is a disability which permits you to return to some kind of work but which prevents you from earning as much wages as you did at the time of the accident.

60. Q How much compensation do I get for partial disability?

A You are entitled to the difference between your average weekly wage at the time of the accident and the actual wages you are able to earn thereafter but in no event more than $40.00 per week.

61. Q How long do partial disability benefits run?

A For permanent partial disability, payments are made in accordance with the schedule set out in the act herein at pages 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34.

For permanent partial disability not covered by provisions of the schedule the aggregate weekly indemnity shall bear such relation to the aggregate weekly indemnity for permanent total disability as the nature of the injury bears to one causing permanent total disability. Such weekly indemnity shall be in addition to compensation for healing period and shall be for the period that he may live not to exceed, however, these named limits, to wit: 1,000 weeks for all persons 50 years of age or less. For each successive yearly age group beginning with 51 years, the maximum limit shall be reduced by 2½% per year until a minimum of 500 weeks shall be reached.

SPECIFIC LOSS

62. Q What compensation do I get if I lose a member of my body?

A Indemnity is paid for healing period, and also where employee is 50 years old or less, $40.00 maximum and $8.75 minimum for the following periods:

LOSS OF	WEEKS
1. Arm at shoulder	500
2. Arm at elbow	450

3. Hand	400
4. Palm where thumb remains	275
5. Thumb and metacarpal bone	125
6. Thumb at proximal joint	100
7. Thumb at distal joint	40
8. All fingers on one hand at proximal joints	225
9. Fingers:
Index finger and metacarpal bone	60
Index finger at proximal joint	50
Index finger at second joint	30
Index finger at distal joint	12
Middle finger and metacarpal bone	45
Middle finger at proximal joint	35
Middle finger at second joint	20

Middle finger at distal joint	8
Ring finger and metacarpal bone	26
Ring finger at proximal joint	20
Ring finger at second joint	15
Ring finger at distal joint	6
Little finger and metacarpal bone	28
Little finger at proximal joint	22
Little finger at second joint	16
Little finger at distal joint	6
10. Leg at hip joint	500
11. Leg at knee	425
12. Foot at ankle	250
13. Great toe with metatarsal bone	83-1/3

14. Toes:

Great toe at proximal joint	25
Great toe at distal joint	12
Second toe with metatarsal bone	25
Second toe at proximal joint	8
Second toe at second joint	6
Second toe at distal joint	4
3rd, 4th, or little toe with metatarsal bone	20
3rd, 4th, or little toe at proximal joint	6
3rd, 4th or little toe at second or distal joint	4

15. Eye by enucleation or evisceration 275

16. Total impairment of one eye for industrial use 250

17. Total deafness from accident or sudden trauma 333-1/3

18. Total deafness of one ear from accident or sudden trauma 50

In case an accident causes more than one permanent injury specified above, the period for which indemnity shall be payable for each additional equal or lesser disability shall be increased as follows:

a. In case of impairment of both eyes, by 200%;

b. In case of disabilities on same hand covered by 9 of this paragraph, by 100% for the first equal or lesser disability and by 150% for the second and third equal or lesser disabilities;

c. In the case of disabilities on the same foot covered by 14 of this paragraph by 20%;

d. In all other cases by 20%;

e. The aggregate result as computed by applying a, and the aggregate result for members on the same hand or foot as computed by applying b and c, shall each be taken as a unit for applying d as between such units, and as between such units, and each other disability.

In cases where the injured employee is above 50 years of age, the period for which indemnity shall be payable, in addition to the healing period, shall be reduced from those specified by 2½% for each year that the age of such employee exceeds 50. The maximum reduction to be not more than 50%. After age 70 there will be no further reduction for permanent disability.

63. Q If I continue working after losing one of above mentioned parts of my body, do I still get compensation for its loss?

A Yes. You don't have to have any loss of wages in order to get compensation for the specific loss.

64. Q Must my eye be actually removed before I can get compensation for its specific loss?

A No. If your vision is so impaired as the result of your accident that it is useless in industry, you are entitled to compensation for specific loss of the eye without actually having it removed.

65. Q If I lose a member of my body and the loss disables me, can I get permanent disability benefit?

A No. You must take the amount set out in the specific loss schedule. Payment of that ends your employer's liability no matter how disabling the loss is.

66. Q Suppose I lose part of the use of a member of my body, am I entitled to partial permanent loss?

A Indemnity in such cases shall be determined by allowing weekly indemnity during the healing period resulting from the injury and the percentage of permanent disability resulting thereafter as found by the Commission.

67. Q If I have injuries besides the amputation, to what am I entitled?

A You can then get compensation for general disability to and after payment for your specific loss; for instance, if your hand was removed as a result of the accident and thereafter, your arm wasted away because of the accident, you would be entitled to additional benefits beyond the loss of your hand because of the additional disability in your arm.

MEDICAL BENEFITS

68. Q Am I entitled to any medical or hospital treatment if injured?

A The employer shall supply such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches, artificial members and appliances as may be reasonably required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury not to exceed the period for which indemnity is payable.

69. Q When is compensation barred for refusal of treatment?

A Compensation is barred to one who refuses hospital or sanatorium treatment for tuberculosis when found necessary by the commission. This also is the case for refusal of medical and surgical treatment. In other than tuberculosis, when medical and surgical treatment is refused loss of compensation is to the extent that refusal of treatment augments disability.

70. Q Who has the right to choose the doctor to take care of me?

A Your employer must furnish a list of physicians which is called a 'panel' and you may select anyone of the physicians on this panel. The number of physicians on the panel is determined by the Industrial Commission.

71. Q If my employer refuses to give me medical care and I get my own doctor, who pays him?

A If the injury is compensable, the employer must pay him.

72. Q Does my employer have to furnish me with artificial limbs, artificial eyes or false teeth?

A The employer must furnish crutches, artificial members and appliances as may be reasonably required to relieve from the effects of the injury.

73. Q Is damage or destruction of eye glasses covered?

A Yes, if the same results from an accident which causes personal injury entitling the employee to compensation either for disability or medical treatment.

LUMP SUM PAYMENTS

74. Q How are compensation benefits paid to me?

A They are paid to you weekly.

75. Q Can I draw my compensation benefits in one large sum?

A Ordinarily no. In exceptional cases and by special permission of the Industrial Commission, you may do so.

76. Q In what cases does the Industrial Commission allow such payments?

A You must show to the Industrial Commission that the payment in a large sum would be more beneficial to you than the weekly compensation. This permission is very rarely given and very good cause must be shown before the Industrial Commission will approve such payment.

77. Q What is a lump sum payment?

A By a lump sum payment is meant the payment in one sum of the present value of your employer's established liability for compensation to you.

78. Q Must my employer consent to payment of a lump sum for me to obtain it?

A No. The Industrial Commission may order such lump sum payment even though your employer does not consent to it.

79. Q After a lump sum payment, can I reopen my case?

A Only if there has been a mutual mistake of either law or fact or a development unforeseen at the time of establishing the liability.

MINORS

80. Q If I am under age, am I entitled to any special consideration under the Workmen's Compensation law?

A Yes. The law provides that an employee under 18 years of age, illegally employed shall receive:

(a) If permitted to work without a permit, double the amount otherwise recoverable.

(b) If permitted to work without a permit at any employment in which the Industrial Commission has specified that no permit should be issued, three times the amount otherwise recoverable.

(c) If permitted to work at any prohibited employment, three times the amount otherwise recoverable.

(d) If the minor is under permit age and illegally employed, three times the amount recoverable.

(e) Increased compensation or increased death benefits payable by employer as double compensation shall not exceed $5,000.00 and amount payable as treble compensation shall not exceed $7,500.00

(f) Double or treble compensation shall not be payable unless employer sought to be charged, knew or should have known that the minor was illegally employed by the contractor or subcontractor.

81. Q How can I find out whether my employment is one not approved by the Industrial Commission?

A Write to the Industrial Commission at Madison, Wisconsin, and inquire of them.

82. Q Suppose I furnish a birth certificate or working permit to my employer, am I still entitled to excessive compensation?

A Ordinarily no, not under these circumstances.

MISCELLANEOUS

83. Q If I recover from my injuries sufficiently to return to work, must my employer rehire me?

A There is a penalty of from $50.00 to $500.00 as against an employer who, without reasonable cause, refuses to rehire an employee injured in the course of employment.

84. Q Suppose I have a Group Policy that entitles me to weekly benefits, shall I accept them?

A Yes. It has nothing whatever to do with your right to compensation.

DEATH BENEFITS

85. Q If my death proximately results from an industrial injury, who pays my funeral bill and medical expenses?

A Your employer must pay the funeral expenses but not over $350.00. He must also pay the medical expenses caused by the injury.

85½. Q If death occurs to an injured employee other than as a proximate result of the injury, before disability indemnity ceases, how are funeral expenses handled?

A Where the injury proximately causes permanent partial disability, the unaccrued compensation shall first be applied toward funeral expenses not to exceed $350.00.

86. Q Are burial expense allowances provided where death results from causes other than the injury in a case of permanent total disability?

A Yes, but burial expense along with compensation payable in life and death benefit payable to dependents is subject to the limitation and not additional to it as in the case of death caused by the injury.

87. Q What other death benefits does The Workmen's Compensation law provide?

A Where death proximately results from an injury and the deceased leaves a person wholly dependent upon him for support, the death benefit shall equal four times his average annual earnings, but the total amount paid as death benefit, shall not exceed 1,000 weeks for any person 50 years of age or less. For each yearly group beginning with 51, the maximum limitation is reduced by 2½% per year until a minimum limit of 500 weeks shall be reached. Maximum death benefit $15,428.00. Maximum weekly benefit $54.00.

88. Q If I am single and have no dependents, who gets my death benefits?

A In that case, your employer would pay only for your funeral and medical expenses. In addition, the employer must pay into the State Fund, a sum not exceeding $3,000. This fund is used to discharge liability for additional death benefits hereinafter described.

89. Q Are there any additional benefits for children of an employee whose death is caused by industrial accident?

A Yes. Where the husband or wife of a deceased employee is wholly dependent for support, an additional death benefit shall be paid from the funds provided from the State treasury as above described. For each child by their marriage, living at the time of the employee's death and who is likewise wholly dependent upon him for support, such additional benefit shall be computed from the date of the death of the employee as follows:

For a child, one year of age or under, a sum equal to the average annual earnings of the deceased employee; for children in each successive yearly age group, the amount allowed shall be reduced by 1/18th part of such annual earnings, with an allowance for any child up to 18 years of age at the death of the employee.

90. Q Whom does the law consider as dependents?

A The following are presumed to be solely and wholly dependent upon the deceased employee:

(c) A child under the age of 18 years.

(d) A child over said age but physically or mentally incapacitated from earning.

(e) A member of the family of the deceased employee or a lineal descendant or ancestor or brother or sister may be a dependent if actually supported or partially supported by the deceased employee. Unestranged parents residing in any of the territorial possessions of the United States are included as eligible for death benefits.

91. Q If there is more than one dependent how is the death benefit allotted?

A If there is more than one person wholly or partially dependent, the death benefit shall be divided between such dependents in such proportion as the Industrial Commission shall determine to be just considering their ages and other facts bearing on such dependency.

92. Q Suppose I am not living with my wife, is she entitled to death benefits?

A Yes. Unless divorced. But if she is living apart from you for justifiable reasons and is still entitled to your support, she would be entitled to death benefits.

93. Q Can anyone else besides my wife and children be considered my dependents?

A. Yes. Members of your family, brothers, sisters, grandchildren or grandparents, who are actually dependent upon you for support.

94. Q Under what circumstances would such relatives be considered dependents?

A If they actually received money from you at the time of your injury and needed it for their support.

95. Q What do you mean by a member of your family?

A By a member of the family is meant anyone who lived with you and is considered one of your family and actually dependent upon you for support.

96. Q Suppose my wife with whom I am living at the time of my injury is employed, is she entitled to death benefits?

A Yes. The law conclusively presumes her to be wholly dependent upon you even though she may have some other income.

97. Q Suppose a child of mine under 18 years of age has a separate income, is he entitled to death benefits?

A Yes. The law conclusively presumes such a child to be wholly dependent upon you, regardless of whether or not you support him, but it is to be remembered that it is only when there is no living dependent spouse that children receive the benefits.

98. Q If my wife is employed and is killed, what death benefits are payable?

A The same death benefits are payable for a woman as for a man and the dependents are the same.

99. Q Can a husband recover compensation for the death of his wife?

A Yes. The same as she could recover for his death.

100. Q What is meant by a total dependent?

A A total dependent is one who is entirely dependent upon you for support or who is conclusively presumed by the law to be dependent upon you at the time of the injury.

101. Q What is meant by a partial dependent?

A A partial dependent is a person who receives some support from you but is not entirely dependent upon you at the time of your injury; for instance, a mother who receives some money for her support from her son would be partially dependent upon him.

102. Q How much does a partial dependent receive?

A Provided there are no total dependents, a partial dependent receives compensation equal to the same proportion of your weekly payments for the benefit of persons wholly dependent as the amount contributed by you to such partial dependent bears to your annual earnings at the time of your accident.

103. Q Will you illustrate how to figure partial dependency?

A Yes. If the deceased worker was earning $70.00 per week and had worked the entire year, he would have earned $3,640.00. If he had contributed $23.34 a week toward his mother's support, she would have received 1/3 of his annual income or $1,213.68. Since the amount payable for total dependency would be $54.00 per week, the amount payable in this case to the mother would be 1/3 of $54.00 per week or $18.00 per week.

104. Q If I die while I am getting compensation what do my dependents get?

A If an award by the Industrial Commission had been made, your dependents receive the balance of compensation from the date ~~of~~ your death that you would be entitled to receive had you lived.

105. Q If I have an injury at work and die without receiving any compensation, what do my dependents get?

A If your death was not caused by the injury, they would receive the balance of the compensation due you at the time of your death.

106. Q How are death benefit payments made?

A Death benefit payments are paid in weekly installments corresponding in amount to 50% of the weekly earnings of the employee until otherwise ordered by the Industrial Commission.

107. Q Unless totally dependent what death benefits do unestranged parents receive?

A $2,000.00.

PROCEDURE

108. Q If I am entitled to compensation and have given proper notice, how do I go about getting it?

A In about 90% of the cases, compensation is paid without any dispute by the employers. In about 10% of the cases the employer refuses to pay.

CLAIM AND HEARING

109. Q What shall I do if my employer refuses to pay me compensation?

A File a petition with the Industrial Commission. This petition is in a form printed by the Industrial Commission and can be obtained for the asking and is called "Application for Adjustment of Claim."

110. Q Where can I obtain this form?

A You can obtain this form either by writing to the Industrial Commission at Madison, Wis., or at the Milwaukee office at 794 N. Jefferson Street.

111. Q Where do I file this application when filled out?

A File it with the Industrial Commission at Madison, Wis., or with the Milwaukee office at 794 N. Jefferson Street.

112. Q What suggestion do you make for me to follow in filling out the forms?

A Do the following:

(a) Make 4 copies of your application and mail the original and two copies to the Industrial Commission at Madison, Wis.

(b) See that the blanks are filled in as accurately as possible. If you do not know the dates or amounts, put in the words "on or about"; for instance, if you think the accident happened in the summer of 1949 instead of putting in the exact date, put in "on or about July or August, 1949."

(c) Consult your steward or your attorney.

113. Q How long after the accident do I have to file my claim?

A If no compensation has been paid you must file within two years from the date of the injury or death.

114. Q Supposing I have not given notice or made application, what shall I do?

A See your attorney. Do not judge for yourself as to whether or not proper notice has been given in your case. It may be that your right to compensation has not been lost.

115. Q What happens after I file my application with the Industrial Commission?

A Your case is set for hearing before an examiner. The Industrial Commission will mail you a notice of the time and place of the hearing.

116. Q Must I be present then?

A Yes, absolutely. You must appear for the hearing.

117. Q Do I have to bring a witness to the accident with me?

A If you have witnesses to the accident take them with you.

118. Q Is the testimony of out of state doctors, and are hearings outside of the state permitted?

A Yes, for the sake of convenience of the parties and witnesses.

119. Q What shall I do if my witnesses refuse to come to the hearing?

A You can subpoena them. At your request the Industrial Commission will furnish the necessary printed form of subpoena.

120. Q Suppose there are no witnesses to the accident, how can I prove my case?

A Your own word may be enough, particularly if it is verified by surrounding circumstances such as prompt report of your accident to the employer.

121. Q Suppose my employer, while admitting that I had an accident, denies that I am disabled because of it, what shall I do?

A Get your own doctor to examine you and to appear and testify in your behalf at the compensation hearing. Many of the difficulties regarding the payment of compensation arise because of differences of opinion as to the extent of disability.

122. Q Is the hearing before the examiner a trial?

A While it is not called a trial, it is very much like the trial of a case in court. You should be sufficiently prepared to try your case.

123. Q Do I have to get a lawyer to represent me at the hearing?

A No. It is not required by law.

124. Q Is it advisable for me to have a lawyer?

A It usually is. If you feel the need, get one. There are many competent attorneys who are able to prepare and present your claim for compensation properly. In most cases claims for compensation are not denied by employers or insurance companies unless they feel they have a chance of winning their case. They hire very able lawyers to present their side of the story and you are usually at a disadvantage in such instances, without one.

125. Q What happens after the hearing?

A The examiner makes his findings of fact and files his award and the Industrial Commission will mail you a copy of it.

APPEALS

126. Q If I lose my case before the examiner, what shall I do?

A You may file an appeal with the Industrial Commission within 20 days from the date stamped upon the award. The Industrial Commission furnishes printed blanks entitled "Petition for Review of Findings and Order of Examiner."

127. Q Where do I obtain these forms?

A Either at the Madison or Milwaukee office of the Industrial Commission.

128. Q Suppose I haven't time enough within the 20 days to obtain the form required and file them with the Industrial Commission, what can I do?

A Notify the Industrial Commission immediately at Madison that you are appealing the decision of the examiner and fill out the form as soon as possible.

129. Q Suppose I wait longer than 20 days, have I lost my right to appeal?

A No. Not in all cases. For good cause the Industrial Commission may grant you the right to file a late appeal but since this is done only in exceptional cases, file your appeal immediately after receiving the decision of the examiner.

130. Q If I win my case, can my employer appeal?

A Yes. He has the same right to appeal you have.

131. Q After I file an appeal with the Industrial Commission, what must I do then?

A The Industrial Commission must within 10 days after the filing of such petition either affirm, refuse, set aside or modify such findings or order in whole or in part or direct the taking of additional testimony. Such action shall be based on a review of the evidence submitted.

132. Q Am I notified of this decision?

A Yes. You will receive a copy of the decision from the Commission.

133. Q Is the decision of the Commission the last word?

A No, not always. Either party may appeal to the circuit court of Dane County.

134. Q What do I do to appeal to the circuit court of Dane County?

A This is a technical and important procedure and should be done by an attorney.

135. Q If I lose the case in the circuit court of Dane County, what do I do?

A You can appeal the case to the Supreme Court of the State of Wisconsin. This should not be attempted without the services of an attorney.

135½ Q Is State of Wisconsin liable for interest payment upon awards?

A Yes, where payment is not made when due just as other employers and insurance carriers are now liable. This occurs when appeal is made from the Commission's award to the courts.

FINAL RECEIPTS

136. Q What happens when I get well or return to work?

A Your employer or his insurance company will submit a Final Receipt for compensation to you for your signature on a printed form which must be substantially as suggested by the Industrial Commission.

137. Q What is a Final Receipt for compensation?

A It is an agreement between you and your employer that you have received your compensation in full.

138. Q Shall I sign this final receipt when I get well?

A Yes, provided that both your own doctor and the company doctor tell you you have recovered completely and you believe them. If you have recovered only partially, you may still be entitled to compensation.

139. Q Shall I sign this receipt after I return to work?

A Only if you return to such work as enables you to earn your average weekly wage as previously computed. If you are still partly disabled and are returning to work at a lesser pay, you are still entitled to partial disability benefits and should not sign the final receipt.

140. Q Shall I get a copy of the final receipt?

A Yes, be sure to do so.

FURTHER COMPENSATION OR REOPENING CASE

141. Q Does the signing of a Final Receipt close my case for good?

A No. If you are still disabled or have acquired new or additional disabilities as a result of your accident, the case may be reopened.

142. Q If I refuse to sign the Final Receipt, can my employer stop or reduce my compensation?

A Yes.

143. Q What shall I do if I do not believe that my compensation should be stopped or reduced?

A Make application for adjustment of claim for compensation as described heretofore. See page 18.

144. Q If my employer will not agree to pay me for the compensation what can I do?

A Petition the Industrial Commission for adjustment of your claim. The procedure in filing and on the hearing of such application is the same as in the case of an original notice and application for adjustment of claim.

145. Q How long do I have to file a petition for further compensation?

A. Six years from the date of the injury.

145½. Q Does the employer or insurer have equal rights with the employee to have review of a compromise?

A Yes, upon petition filed by the employer or insurer with the Commission within one year from any award upon a stipulation of settlement, the Commission shall have power to set aside said award or otherwise determine the rights of the parties.

VIII

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS

146. Q If my employer sends me notice to report for examination by his doctor, must I do so?

A Yes. The law requires that you submit to such examination.

147. Q What happens if I refuse to go for such examination?

A Your right to compensation may be suspended or lost.

148. Q Who pays for this examination?

A Your employer or his insurance company must pay for it.

149. Q Must I accept the company doctor's opinion as final?

A. No. If there is any doubt in your mind, consult your own doctor.

IX

OCCUPATIONAL DISEASES

150. Q Suppose I do not have an accident but get a disease that is caused by my work, can I get any workmen's compensation?

A Yes. Any disease causing injury arising out of your employment is compensable.

151. Q What notice do I have to give in order to obtain compensation for an occupational disease?

A You must give the same type of notice as required in the case of accidental injury.

152. Q How and when do I file my claim for compensation for an occupational disease?

A Such a claim must be filed in the same manner as in the case of an accidental injury. However, the form of application furnished by the Industrial Commission is different.

153. Q How is it different?

A It requires much more detailed information and is especially designed for occupational disease claims.

154. Q What notice must I give if I strain myself and get a hernia?

A In case of hernia, you must promptly report it to your employer as soon as you notice it, regardless of whether or not you are immediately disabled.

155. Q How much compensation can I get for an occupational disease?

A Except as to silicosis and other dust diseases, you will receive the same amount of compensation as in the case of an accidental injury.

156a. Q What compensation do I get for silicosis?

A If silicosis causes disability or death, you receive the same compensation. However, the legislature has provided for payment for wage loss suffered by non-disabling silicosis. If you have silicosis or a loss of hearing due to prolonged exposure to noise in your employment but it does not disable you and you are discharged or transferred by your employer the Industrial Commission may find that it is inadvisable for you to continue in his employ and may order such compensation on account thereof as it may deem just not exceeding $3,500.00. If after your discharge you become disabled not because of additional exposure but due to exposure in the employer's service, any amount which shall have been paid under this section shall be credited against compensation found to be payable by such employer for disability caused by silicosis but shall not operate to reduce the number of weeks provided under the law for disability.

If you cease work because of a non-disabling silicosis or a loss of hearing due to prolonged exposure to noise in your employment you may make claim even after you have terminated the employment. You may draw compensation up to $3,500.00 if it is shown that your silicosis or hearing condition makes it inadvisable for you to work on a job entailing a silicotic or noise exposure, and you suffer a wage loss.

156b. Q What are the provisions for total occupational deafness?

A Total occupational deafness:

One ear	36 weeks
Both ears	216 weeks

157. Q Where a case is decided on the basis of accidental injury, but in fact involves occupational disease what can be done?

A The Commission may with or without a hearing, within three (3) years from the date of the erroneous findings set aside the order, likewise the Commission may take such action upon application made within such three (3) years, and correct its mistake upon proper showing.

158. Q Has the Commission the right to review a case of occupational disease?

A Yes, it is authorized from time to time to review a case of occupational disease, its findings and order based on facts regarding disability or otherwise, as they may later appear—this in spite of any previous order. In all cases the six (6) year statute of limitation forecloses further action.

Secretary

RALPH E. GINTZ
Director of Workmen's Compensation

FACTS ABOUT THE WISCONSIN WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW

1. Q: What is the Wisconsin Workmen's Compensation Act?
   A: It is the law which provides for medical and money benefits to employes injured by reason of their work, and for death benefits to their dependents.
2. Q: By whom is the act administered?
   A: By the Industrial Commission, Madison, Wisconsin.

INJURIES COVERED

3. Q: What injuries are covered?
   A: Mental and physical harm of all kinds, whether due to accident or disease, and also accidental damage to, or destruction of artificial members, dental appliances, and teeth, also eye glasses provided they are damaged in an accident which causes some personal injury, although slight.
4. Q: Are all occupational diseases covered?
   A: Yes, all diseases due to employment, such as silicosis, lead poisoning, hernia, dermatitis, and loss of hearing, caused by exposure over a period of time to conditions which result in injury.

CONDITIONS OF LIABILITY

5. Q: What must an employe show to entitle him to benefits?

   A: That he and his employer were subject to the compensation act; that he was injured while performing service for his employer; that the injury was not intentionally self-inflicted; and that his injury was caused by his work.

6. Q: Is an employe who is injured while merely going to or from work entitled to benefits?

   A: Yes, but only if he is on the premises of his employer at the time, or on premises where his service is to be performed. If he is actually performing service for his employer, or is being transported by the employer when injured, and is hurt because of a hazard of service, he will be entitled to benefits whether or not he is on the employer's premises when hurt. An employe whose employment requires him to travel is deemed to be performing service at all times while on a trip, except as he steps aside to do some personal act. He is covered while traveling in trains, cabs, or while in eating places, hotels and other places of sojourn, provided he has not deviated for a private or personal purpose. Actions reasonably necessary for living, such as eating, bathing, etc., are not to be regarded as such deviation.

7. Q: What employers are subject to the act?

   A: (1) All employers, except farmers, who have at any time, even momentarily, employed three or more persons in the course of a trade, business, profession or occupation and have not elected not to be subject to the act; (2) all employers, except farmers, who usually employ three or more persons in the course of a trade, business, profession or occupation are compulsorily subject and may not withdraw; (3) all municipal divisions, such as the state, county, city, village and school district, regardless of the number of employes. Employers of domestic servants and other persons not employed in the business or trade of the employer are not subject but the employer may voluntarily become subject by taking a policy of workmen's compensation insurance. (4) A farmer who employs 6 or more employes on 20 or more days in a calendar year becomes subject to the act. Other farmers may voluntarily elect to come under the law by taking out workmen's compensation insurance. Certain specified close relatives are not counted as employes in determining whether the farmer is subject.

8. Q: Suppose the employer has two employes in one business and one in another, or two employes in one city and one in another?

   A: The employer becomes subject to the act when he has three employes, whether in one or more businesses or locations.

9. Q: If an employer withdraws from the act, what is his liability in case of injury to an employe?

   A: He may be sued in court, and upon a showing of negligence may be held liable for such damages as are determined by the court and jury.

10. Q: If an employer is subject to the act, may an employe sue in court for injury if he prefers?

A: No; when parties are subject to the act it is the only remedy between them for personal injury arising out of employment.

11 Q: What advantage is there in an employer electing to become subject to the compensation act?

A: He cannot be sued at common law for damages; he becomes liable for definite benefits and may insure his risk.

12. Q: If an employe works for a contractor who is not subject to the act, or who has no insurance, may the employe hold liable the principal employer for whom the contractor performs service?

A: Yes, provided the principal employer is subject to the act. He could not, for example, hold a farmer as principal employer unless the farmer had become subject to the act, nor could he hold a principal employer who had never employed more than two persons and had not become subject to the act.

EMPLOYES COVERED

13. Q: Who are employes subject to the act?

A: Those who work for anything of value but not persons who are working with no intention that payment shall be made for services.

14. Q: May minors receive compensation?

A: Yes. Minors under the act are competent to contract and receive compensation benefits, as are adults.

15. Q: May employes waive their benefits, that is, agree that in case of injury no benefits will be claimed?

A: No, except epileptics and those totally blind, and those only if they have given notice to the commission and the employer in advance, and then only for such injuries as are caused by epilepsy or blindness. Any other agreement to waive benefits is illegal and absolutely void and of no effect.

WAGE BASIS

16. Q: On what basis is money compensation paid?

A: On the wage earned by the employe at the time of injury.

17. Q: What is the wage basis for compensation?

A: The normal full time wage at the time of injury in the employment in which the employe works at that time. Wage earned beyond normal full time hours is counted only if the employe has worked within six calendar weeks or more for the employer in whose employ he is injured, and then only if the average weekly wage earned is higher than the normal full time wage. For example, if the normal full time weekly wage is $60, but over a six week period the employe has put in overtime and earned $450, his actual average weekly wage is $75, and compensation is based on such wage. If, however, during the six week period the employe has lost a good deal of time and has earned only $360, or less, his wage will be $60 per week, based on normal full time.

18. Q: How is the wage of a part time worker fixed?

A: On the wage of a normal full time worker. If, for example, a part time worker performs service for one hour per day, and normal full time workers in the same type of employment work eight hours per day, the part time worker's wage is to be taken on the basis of an eight hour day.

19. Q: What is the minimum weekly wage for compensation purposes?

A: Minimum weekly wage is $12.50 and minimum weekly compensation 70 per cent of that wage, or $8.75. Minimum compensation is payable no matter how small a wage the employe may earn. Minimum weekly wage is always at least 30 times the hourly rate if such wage amounts to more than $12.50 per week. Minimum weekly wage for permanent disability is $20, with weekly compensation 70 per cent of that wage, or $14.

20. Q: What is the maximum weekly wage?

A: Maximum wage is $85.72, and maximum compensation is $60 for temporary, permanent total, and death. For permanent partial disability maximum wage is $61.07, and maximum compensation is $42.75. No matter how high the wage, no employe can receive more than these amounts except as increased compensation because of violation of a safety order, or because illegal hiring of a minor may produce a higher amount.

21. Q: Are tips counted in determining wage?

A: All things of value, as board and room, tips, bonuses agreed upon, etc., are counted when they are part of the consideration for work.

22. Q: Must notice of injury be given to the employer in order to obtain compensation?

A: Notice must be given within 30 days from the date of injury, or the right to compensation may be barred. Injury should be reported immediately, or as soon as possible to the foreman or other designated person to avoid doubt being thrown on a later claim, and also so that medical treatment may be promptly given.

23. Q: Suppose notice is not given within 30 days?

A: Claim may still be established if the employer was not misled by failure to give notice. If the employer can show he was misled benefits will not be payable.

FILING OF CLAIMS

24. Q: How soon must claim be made where no compensation has been paid?

A: Application for adjustment of claim must be filed with the Industrial Commission within two years from the date of injury unless compensation has been paid, when the application may be made within six years from the date of the last payment of compensation. The time for filing application may be extended to six years if it can be shown that the employer knew or ought to have known within the two year period that the employe had sustained an injury even without actual resulting disability at the time.

25. Q: Suppose the employe does not learn within two years that an occupational disease was caused by his work?

A: The time is then extended for two years from the time he knew or should have known of the connection between his disease and his work, but is not extended beyond six years from the last day of work before his disability commences.

26. Q: When claim for compensation is made, has the employer a right to have physical examination of an employe made by a doctor?

A: Yes, in order to learn the extent and character of the employe's disability, so that he may know whether or not to pay compensation. If the employe fails to submit to reasonable examination as requested from time to time, his compensation may be suspended. Applicant may have his own doctor present at the time of examination if he wishes. If the examination is considered unreasonable, the matter may be submitted to the commission for decision. The employe is entitled to compensation for time lost and to his traveling expense, if any, in submitting to examination.

27. Q: Suppose a dispute arises as to liability and the parties wish to settle on a basis agreeable to them?

A: They may do so, but always subject to the commission's approval. If the commission does not approve settlement, it has no effect, and further claim may be made. All compromise agreements are subject to review by the Industrial Commission within one year.

WHO BEARS COST?

28. Q: May an employer charge the employe for the cost of compensation insurance or benefits?

A: No; the law makes that illegal and provides penalties.

29. Q: Should an employe sign receipt for compensation?

A: Yes, but the signing of receipt does not prevent him from claiming and recovering additional compensation even though the receipt may state that the amount paid is in final settlement.

HEARING PROCEDURE

30. Q: In case of dispute what may the employe do to obtain compensation?

A: He may file his application for adjustment of claim with the Industrial Commission, Madison, Wisconsin. Blank forms are supplied by the commission upon request. After application is filed, hearing is set as soon as possible at a selected center, as close to applicant's residence as possible, upon notice given at least 10 days in advance to all interested parties.

31. Q: Must the applicant be represented at hearing by attorney?

A: No; the law provides he may appear in person, by agent or by attorney.

32. Q: If an employe is not represented by attorney, who assists him in bringing out the facts?

A: The commission's examiner who conducts the hearing will ask questions of all witnesses present at the hearing. (See 36. Q. and A.)

33. Q: Is there any limitation as to attorney's fee?

A: The law allows an attorney to charge up to 20% of the amount recovered, unless there is no dispute and no need for hearing, when the fee charged cannot exceed 10% and not more than $100 in any case.

34. Q: Who must pay the attorney's fee?

A: The person making claim must pay the fee from the compensation which is awarded. It is well to have a clear understanding in advance with the attorney as to the fee to be charged.

35. Q: May a union representative represent an employe at hearing?

A: Yes; any person, upon proper showing, may obtain permission from the examiner to represent a claimant.

36. Q: Must the applicant have witnesses at hearings?

A: Witnesses are not needed as to points not in dispute. As to points in dispute appearance of witnesses should be arranged. Each party must bear the expense of producing his own witnesses. If there is question as to what witnesses are needed, and no lawyer is retained, the commission may be consulted at the time of filing application, or as soon as possible before hearing.

37. Q: Are doctors' reports admissible as evidence for the employe?

A: Yes, of doctors licensed and practicing in Wisconsin and of doctors outside Wisconsin to whom the claimant had been sent for examination or treatment by the employer or insurance company. These must be notarized or certified, on forms provided by the commission, and filed with the commission at least 15 days before the time of hearing. They should be presented at the time application is filed, or as soon thereafter as possible. Forms are supplied by the commission on request.

38. Q: Who conducts hearings and decides cases?

A: Law examiners of the Industrial Commission.

APPEALS

39. Q: May there be appeal from the examiner's findings?

A: Yes, to the Industrial Commission as a body. This must be done within 20 days from the date of the order made by the examiner after hearing. If petition for review is not filed within 20 days from that date, the commission and the court loses jurisdiction.

40. Q: What further appeals are possible, after appeal to the commission?

A: One to the Circuit Court of Dane County within 30 days from the order of the commission as a body, and to the Supreme Court within 30 days from notice of entry of judgement of the Circuit Court.

EXEMPTION FROM DEBT

41. Q: May compensation be assigned?

A: No; neither can it be taken for debt, either by garnishee action or otherwise, except for Federal Income Tax. It is not necessary to report compensation payments for income tax purposes, as income tax is not charged on workmen's compensation benefits.

LIABILITY FOR COMPENSATION

42. Q: Who pays compensation?

A: Most employers carry insurance so that the insurance company pays benefits. Some employers are "self-insurers" and pay compensation directly. In either case, the employer is primarily responsible for payment.

43. Q: Are employers required to insure their compensation liability?

A: All employers subject to the act are required to insure unless excused by the Industrial Commission on a showing of financial ability to pay claims. Only a small number of employers are "self-insurers." Failure of employers to insure unless excused calls for heavy penalties.

44. Q: If a person is hurt by negligence of a "third party" may he take compensation and also sue the third party?

A: Yes. He will then receive his full compensation benefits and also one-third of the net amount recovered from the third party. All costs of collection, including attorney's fees, are taken out before division of proceeds is made. The insurance company or employer is then repaid the amount paid or to be paid as compensation, and if any balance remains that also is paid to the employe. Action against a third party is usually by joint action of the employer or his insurance carrier and the injured employe.

MEDICAL BENEFITS

45. Q: What are the benefits under the act?

A: (1) Medical treatment; (2) compensation for lost time, wage and disability; (3) death benefit; (4) maintenance during rehabilitation training.

46. Q: What medical benefits are provided?

A: Every sort of medical or hospital treatment reasonably necessary. Treatment by a doctor of osteopathy or a chiropodist (foot doctor) is included. Treatment by a masseur or physical therapist is included when prescribed by a regularly qualified physician. Artificial limbs and appliances of all kinds when needed are also to be provided but are not required to be replaced. Employes are entitled to compensation for lost time and for necessary traveling expense when submitting to treatment.

46a. Q: Is treatment by a chiropractor provided?

A: There is no liability for chiropractic treatment unless such is prescribed by a regularly qualified physician.

46b. Q: Is Christian Science treatment provided?

A: Christian Science treatment may be provided in lieu of medical treatment unless the employer has filed notice with the commission not to provide such treatment.

47. Q: Is there any limit as to time or amount of medical and hospital benefits?

A: Absolutely none, except treatment must be reasonably necessary and the expense must be reasonable.

48. Q: Who supplies the physician?

A: The employer or insurance company must give the employe his choice from a reasonable number of doctors to be listed on a panel. The employe is also entitled to a second choice of physician if he is dissatisfied with the first physician chosen. The commission may, in addition, permit choice of some other doctor upon proper showing.

49. Q: What is a "reasonable number" of physicians?

A: That is to be determined by the commission in each case. Most employers list a very wide choice. If the employe believes the employer does not list an adequate number, or that proper treatment is not being given, he should take the matter up with the commission.

50. Q: Must the employe give notice to the employer that he needs treatment?

A: Yes; otherwise he must bear the expense himself, except that in case of emergency the employer becomes liable for the reasonable value of necessary treatment before the time that it is possible to give notice. In case of occupational disease he may recover the reasonable expense of treatment incurred before he knew that his work caused his condition, even though notice is not given.

51. Q: Need artificial members, when worn out, be replaced?

A: No; only one suitable member is required to be supplied. If the member supplied is not suitable, a suitable one must be supplied.

52. Q: Suppose the employe refuses medical treatment?

A: If he refuses reasonable treatment he will lose his rights to compensation so far as his refusal results in greater disability.

PAYMENT AND BASIS OF COMPENSATION

53. Q: When does compensation commence?

A: On the 11th day after the date of injury. There is no compensation for the first three days following the day of first disability except as hereafter noted. For example, an employe who is injured and leaves work on the first day of the month is entitled to compensation only for such disability as results on and after the fifth day of the month. The first payment is due on the eleventh day for such disability as has then resulted, and weekly thereafter during disability. If there is disability following the tenth day after the day of first disability, compensation is also payable for the first three days. If compensation is not received within two weeks after injury, the employe should inform the commission.

54. Q: Are Sundays counted in the first three days?

A: No, unless the employe works on Sundays. Sundays are, however, counted in the running of the ten day period.

55. Q: What money payments of compensation are to be made?

A: Seventy per cent of weekly wage during total disability but not more than $60 for temporary disability, permanent total disability, and death, and $42.75 for permanent partial disability, nor less than $8.75 in any case of temporary total disability, nor $14.00 in case of permanent partial disability or death.

56. Q: Suppose an employe earns $100 per week?

A: No matter how large his wage, the highest compensation payable is $60 per week, as stated in previous answer.

57. Q: Suppose there is disability which causes only partial wage loss?

A: Proportionate compensation is then paid; for half wage loss half of compensation payable for total disability is to be paid. If total disability calls for $60 compensation half wage loss calls for $30.

58. Q: Is compensation payable for all days lost?

A: For each day except Sunday one-sixth of weekly compensation is payable. That is true whether the employe works on Sundays or more or less than six days per week.

59. Q: Suppose disability prevents a man from ever earning again?

A: He receives compensation for the rest of his life.

60. Q: Suppose disability will always remain to the head or body but some work can be done?

A: Compensation is then paid for a limited number of weeks, dependent on age, but never for more than 1000 weeks in addition to the "healing period". To illustrate, if 50% disability results to one 50 years of age or under, compensation is payable for 500 weeks, if 25% disability, to 250 weeks, etc. In cases of persons over 50 years of age, the basic number of weeks for permanent partial disability to the head or body decreases by 2½% each year until age 70, at which age there is no further reduction.

REHIRING OF EMPLOYE

61. Q: Is an employer required to rehire an employe injured in the course of employment?

A: No, but if an employer refuses to rehire such an employe without good cause, or if the employer discriminates against such an employe, the employer is subject to a forfeiture of $50 to $500 in an action by the State of Wisconsin.

DEATH BENEFITS

62. Q: Who is entitled to receive death benefits?

A: Only persons named in the compensation act, including husband, wife, children 18 or under, grandchildren, parents, brothers and sisters, and members of family.

63. Q: How much death benefit can be paid?

A: The largest payment (in case of total dependency) is $17,144, and the smallest $4000.

64. Q: Suppose a person is receiving compensation for permanent disability and then dies from some cause other than injury?

A: Of the balance remaining unpaid, up to $350 is applied on burial expense. The remainder becomes payable to dependents not, however, in a sum greater than such dependents would have received if death had resulted from injury.

65. Q: What may parents receive as death benefit?

A: If they were on friendly terms with the son or daughter, $2000 is paid as death benefit. However, if parents are totally dependent they may receive as much as $4000 to $17,144 varying with the wage of the employe.

66. Q: What may other dependents receive?

A: They may receive the amount which they might have expected to receive from the employe as contribution to support but not more than $17,144 in any case.

67. Q: In addition to death benefit is burial expense payable?

A: Yes, but not more than $350.

68. Q: What is the provision for additional payments to children of a widow who herself is to receive benefits?

A: Children 16 or under living with the employe at the time of injury may receive benefits from a state fund created for that purpose. The amount varies with age up to a total of $4,571 for one child, and is payable at the rate of 13 per cent for each child of the weekly amount paid to the widow or widower.

METHOD OF PAYMENT

69. Q: Are benefits payable in installments or in one sum?

A: The purpose of compensation payments is to replace wage loss as and when it occurs. All compensation, including death benefit, is to be paid in installments as are wages unless a showing is made to the commission that interests of the employe or dependent will be conserved by more rapid or lump sum payments.

70. Q: Do employes or dependents lose compensation if they receive a lump sum payment?

A: As payments are normally due only in installments, 3% compound interest is charged when payments are made more rapidly or in one sum.

SCHEDULES OF BENEFITS

71. Q: In case of loss of a member such as a hand, arm, leg, foot, eye, etc., how is compensation paid?

A: Schedules in the act provide payment for a certain number of weeks for loss by amputation, as of toes, arms, feet, etc., and for loss of vision or hearing. Loss of an arm at the shoulder, for example, calls for payment to a person aged fifty or under of 500 weeks' compensation in addition to compensation for healing period. Loss of vision of one eye calls for 250 weeks' compensation; loss of hand at the wrist 400 weeks; loss of foot at the ankle 250 weeks; loss of thumb at the proximal joint 100 weeks, etc.

72. Q: Does it make a difference whether the right or left member is lost?

A: No, the amount is the same in either case.

73. Q: Does age make a difference?

A: There are reductions of 2½% for each year after age 50 in the number of weeks allowed. For example, one aged 60 when injured will have compensation reduced by 25% in the number of weeks allowed with no further reduction after age 70.

74. Q: In case of loss of members is healing period paid in addition to the number of weeks allowed by schedule?

A: Yes, in all cases compensation is paid for the actual necessary healing period, based on necessary wage loss during temporary disability up to the time the condition has become stationary and permanent disability can be fixed.

75. Q: Suppose there is not loss by amputation but stiffness or other disability?

A: A proportionate number of weeks is then payable. If, for example, the loss of use is one-half of the arm, 250 weeks would be paid instead of 500.

76. Q: Where more than one member, such as finger, arm, hand, leg, etc., is affected is there special provision?

A: Yes, additional amounts are allowed for multiple injuries.

DISFIGUREMENT BENEFITS

77. Q: Suppose disfigurement results?

A: Additional compensation up to $4,286 may be paid for disfigurement of the face, head, neck, hand or arm. It must be shown, however, that the disability is such as probably will cause wage loss—this because the employe is unable to obtain work or must accept a lower wage because of disfigurement.

INCREASED AND DECREASED COMPENSATION

78. Q: Suppose it can be shown that the employer or employe was negligent?

A: Negligence makes no difference as to payment of compensation except as there may be violation of a safety order.

79. Q: May compensation be increased for any reason?

A: Yes. The law requires the employer to furnish a safe place to work and to comply with orders of the Industrial Commission as to safety. If injury is caused by reason of a violation by the employer of the "safe place" statute, or of a safety order, or because of failure of an employer reasonably to enforce compliance by employes with a statute or order, 15% increased compensation becomes payable to the employe or his dependents.

80. Q: May compensation be decreased for any reason?

A: Yes, if the employe willfully fails to follow rules for his safety or to use safety devices which the law requires, adequately maintained and the use of which is enforced compensation may be decreased 15%. If injury occurs because of intoxication, compensation is also decreased 15%.

81. Q: What about illegal employment of minors?

A: If an employer is required to have a permit to hire a minor and no permit is obtained, the employe will receive double compensation for his injury. If he is employed at prohibited employment (whether or not he has a permit), he will receive treble compensation. Under provision of the Child Labor law, certain employments have been prohibited to minors of certain ages.

82. Q: Who pays such increased compensation?

A: It must be paid by the employer himself and not by the insurance company, except if the employer is shown to be insolvent.

PRE-EXISTING DISABILITY

83. Q: Suppose an employe already has disability and injury causes additional disability?

A: If disabilities are sufficiently serious, that is, if such as to call for payment of at least 250 weeks of compensation for each disability, he may receive additional payments from a fund set up in the state treasury for that purpose. The employer thus pays only for the disability caused by his work, and the fund pays additional compensation.

REHABILITATION BENEFITS

84. Q: What about rehabilitation benefits?

A: If the employe has a type of injury which makes it difficult or impossible for him to do work previously performed, he may, during a period not exceeding 40 weeks, receive expenses of travel and costs of maintenance, provided rehabilitation instructions are received elsewhere than at the place of his residence. During the period of rehabilitation compensation is continued on the basis of wage loss.

85. Q: Is there provision for training in the use of artificial limbs?

A: Yes, during such period applicant will continue to receive compensation and is entitled to all training and expenses necessary to attain efficient use of artificial members and appliances.

REPORT OF INJURY BY EMPLOYE

86. Q: What should an employe do when he suffers injury?

A: He should report at once to his employer directly, or through a foreman or designated person; he should submit promptly to all necessary first aid and medical treatment; he should submit to medical examination by the employer's doctor from time to time as requested; if compensation is not promptly paid, he should notify the Industrial Commission.

Many slight injuries produce serious results because first aid or medical treatment is not immediately procured. Many claims are hard to prove because immediate notice of injury was not given to the employer.

HOW TO OBTAIN INFORMATION

87. Q: If an employe has doubt as to his rights or duties, what should he do?

A: He should promptly submit his question to the Workmen's Compensation Division, Industrial Commission, Madison, Wisconsin, or if at Milwaukee he may consult the commission's examiner at 794 North Jefferson Street.

INTERNAL REVENUE CODE, AS AMENDED;
Chapter 9-Employment Taxes
Sub Chapter C-Federal Unemployment Tax Act

SEC. 1600 RATE OF TAX

Every employer (as defined in section 1607 (a) shall pay for the calendar year 1939 and for each calendar year thereafter an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ, equal to 3 per centum of the total wages (as defined in section 1607 (b) paid by him during the calendar year with respect to employment (as defined in section 1607 (c) after December 31, 1938.

SEC. 1601 CREDITS AGAINST TAX

(a) Contributions to State Unemployment Funds -

(1) The taxpayer may, to the extent provided in this subsection and subsection (c), credit against the tax imposed by section 1600 the amount of contributions paid by him into an unemployment fund maintained during the taxable year under the unemployment compensation law of a State which is certified for the taxable year as provided in section 1603.

(2) The credit shall be permitted against the tax for the taxable year only for the amount of contributions paid with respect to such taxable year.

(3) The credit against the tax for any taxable year shall be permitted only for contributions paid on or before the last day upon which the taxpayer is required under section 1604 to file a return for such year; except that credit shall be permitted for contributions paid after such last day, but such credit shall not exceed 90 per centum of the amount which would have been allowable as credit on account of such contributions had they been paid on or before such last day.

(4) Upon the payment of contributions into the unemployment fund of a State which are required under the unemployment compensation law of that State with respect to remuneration on the basis of which, prior to such payment into the proper fund, the taxpayer erroneously paid an amount as contributions under another unemployment compensation law, the payment into the proper fund shall, for purposes of credit against the tax, be deemed to have been made at the time of the erroneous payment. If, by reason of such other law, the taxpayer was entitled to cease paying contributions with respect to services subject to such other law, the payment into the proper fund shall, for purposes of credit against the law, be deemed to have been made on the date the return for the taxable year was filed under section 1604.

(b) Additional Credit - In addition to the credit allowed under subsection (a), a taxpayer may credit against the tax imposed by section 1600 for any taxable year an amount, with respect to the unemployment compensation law of each State certified for the taxable year as provided in section 1602 (or with respect to any provisions thereof so certified), equal to the amount, if any, by which the contributions required to be paid by him with respect to the taxable year were less than the contributions such taxpayer would have been required to pay if throughout the taxable year he had been subject under such State law to the highest rate applied thereunder in the taxable year to any person having individuals in his employ, or to a rate of 2.7 per centum, whichever rate is lower.

(c) Limit On Total Credits - The total credits allowed to a taxpayer under this subchapter shall not exceed 90 per centum of the tax against which such credits are allowable.

(d) Refund or Credit - Refund or credit of the tax (including penalty and interest collected with respect thereto, if any), based on any credit allowable under this section, may be made in accordance with the provisions of law applicable in the case of erroneous or illegal collection of the tax (including statutes of limitations). No interest shall be allowed or paid on the amount of any such credit or refund.

SEC. 1603 APPROVAL OF STATE LAWS

(a) Requirements - The Secretary of Labor shall approve any State law submitted to him, within thirty days of such submission, which he finds provides that --

(1) All compensation is to be paid through public employment offices or such other agencies as the Secretary of Labor may approve;

(2) No compensation shall be payable with respect to any day of unemployment occurring within two years after the first day of the first period with respect to which contributions are required:

(3) All money received in the unemployment fund shall (except for refunds of sums erroneously paid into such fund and except for refunds paid in accordance with the provisions of section 1606 (b) immediately upon such receipt be paid over to the Secretary of the Treasury to the credit of the Unemployment Trust Fund established by section 904 of the Social Security Act (49 Stat. 640; U. S. C., 1934 ed., itle 42, sec. 1104);

(4) All money withdrawn from the unemployment fund of the State shall be used solely in the payment of unemployment compensation, exclusive of expenses of administration, and for refunds of sums erroneously paid into such fund and refunds paid in accordance with the provisions of section 1606 (b): Provided, That an amount equal to the amount of employee payments into the unemployment fund of a State may be used in the payment of cash benefits to individuals with respect to their disability, exclusive of expenses of administration;

(5) Compensation shall not be denied in such State to any otherwise eligible individual for refusing to accept new work under any of the following conditions: (A) If the position offered is vacant due directly to a strike, lockout, or other labor dispute; (B) if the wages, hours, or other conditions of the work offered are substantially less favorable to the individual than those prevailing for similar work in the locality; (C) if as a condition of being employed the individual would be required to join a company union or to resign from or refrain from joining any bona fide labor organization;

(6) All the rights, privileges, or immunities conferred by such law or by acts done pursuant thereto shall exist subject to the power of the legislature to amend or repeal such law at any time.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

1. What is the purpose of the Wisconsin Unemployment Compensation Act?

TO PROVIDE MONETARY BENEFITS TO ELIGIBLE EMPLOYEES WHO BECOME UNEMPLOYED.

2. Who is covered by the Wisconsin Unemployment Compensation Act?

BASICALLY ALL EMPLOYEES OF EMPLOYERS OF FOUR (4) OR MORE EMPLOYEES AND THE EMPLOYEES OF EMPLOYERS WHO VOLUNTARILY ELECT TO COVER THEMSELVES.

"'Employe' means any individual who is or has been performing services for an employing unit, in an employment..."

"Any...employer, who has employed as many as 4 individuals in 'employment' on each of some 20 days during the taxable year, each day being in a different calendar week...shall become an employer..."
108.02 (4)(d)

"'Employment'...means any service...performed by an individual for pay." It does not include employment in agricultural labor, domestic service, and logging operations.
108.02 (5)(a)(g)

3. What conditions must exist before an employe is eligible to receive unemployment compensation benefits?

1) HE MUST BE EITHER PARTIALLY OR TOTALLY UNEMPLOYED

"An employe is 'partially unemployed' in any week for which he receives some wages but less than his weekly benefit rate."

"An employe shall be deemed 'totally unemployed' in any week for which he receives no wages."
108.02 (17)

2) HE MUST FILE A CLAIM FOR UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION BENEFITS

"To receive benefits for any given week of his unemployment an employe shall give notice to the (industrial) commission with respect to such week of unemployment, through a public employment office, within such time limit and in such manner as the commission may by rule prescribe."

3) HE MUST BE AVAILABLE FOR WORK AND PHYSICALLY ABLE TO WORK

"An employe shall be ineligible for benefits for any week in which he is with due notice called on by his current employing unit to report for work actually available within such week and is unavailable for work or physically unable to do his work."

108.04 (1)(a)

"An employe shall be ineligible for benefits from an employer's account for any given week if his employment with such employer was suspended by the employe or by the employer or was terminated by such employer because the employe was unavailable for work... or physically unable to do his work, in case such unavailability or inability continues during the week in question..."
108.04 (1)(b)

"A pregnant woman shall be deemed unavailable for work and ineligible for benefits for the period which begins 8 weeks before the week which includes the expected date of childbirth and which ends 4 weeks after the week which includes the date of childbirth."
108.04 (1)(c)

4) HE MUST REGISTER FOR WORK EACH WEEK

"An employe shall be deemed eligible, for waiting period or benefit purposes, as to any given week for which he receives no wages, only if he has within such week registered for work in such manner as may then be prescribed by commission rules..."
108.04 (2)(a)

"Any claimant, thus registered, may also be required at any time to make such other efforts to secure work as the commission may reasonably direct under the circumstances, and to supply proper evidence thereof; and shall, if he fails without good cause to do so, be ineligible for each week such failure continues."
108.04 (2)(b)

5) HE MUST HAVE HAD 14 OR MORE WEEKS OF EMPLOYMENT IN THE LAST 52

"An employe shall not be eligible to receive benefits for any given week of unemployment unless he has had a total of 14 or more 'weeks of employment' from one or more employers within the 52 weeks preceding the close of his most recent week of employment."
108.04 (4)(a)

6) HE MUST WAIT ONE CALENDAR WEEK IN EACH CALENDAR YEAR

"An employe shall become eligible to receive benefits for his weeks of unemployment ending within a given calendar year only after he has had 1 waiting period week, ending within such year..."
108.04 (3)(b)

"Only those weeks of an employe's unemployment for which he would otherwise be eligible to receive benefits shall be counted as waiting period weeks."
108.04 (3)(a)

"Not more than 1 of the weeks ending between October 31 and the following March 1 shall be required of an employe as waiting period."
108.04 (3)(c)

7) HE MUST NOT HAVE BEEN DISCHARGED FOR MISCONDUCT

"An employe's eligibility, for benefits based on those credit weeks then accrued with respect to an employing unit, shall be barred for any week of unemployment completed after he has been discharged by the employing unit for misconduct connected with his employment; provided, moreover, that such employe shall be deemed ineligible for benefits (from other previous employer accounts) for the week in which such discharge occurred and for the 3 next following weeks."

8) HE MUST NOT BE UNDER DISCIPLINARY SUSPENSION

"As to an employe's weeks of unemployment by reason of a disciplinary suspension by a given employer, the employe shall be ineligible for benefits from such employer's account as follows:

1. If the suspension was for misconduct connected with his employment, he shall be ineligible for each such week.
2. If the suspension was for other good cause connected with his employment, he shall be ineligible for the first 3 such weeks ending within any calendar year."

9) HE MUST NOT HAVE VOLUNTARILY TERMINATED HIS EMPLOYMENT EXCEPT FOR CAUSE

"If an employe terminates his employment with an employer, he shall be ineligible for any benefits based on such employment, and ineligible for benefits based on other previous employment for the week of termination and the 4 next following weeks" UNLESS:

"the commission determines that the employe terminated his employment with good cause attributable to the employing unit...(or) "the commission determines that the employe terminated his employment for compelling personal reasons; provided that, if the commission determines that he is physically unable to work or substantially unavailable for work, he shall be ineligible while such inability or unavailability continues...(or) "the commission determines that the employe terminated his employment to take another job; provided, that he shall be ineligible, for benefits based on the employment terminated, until he has been employed within at least 7 subsequent weeks."

10) HE MUST NOT HAVE FAILED TO APPLY FOR OR ACCEPT WORK OFFERED EXCEPT FOR GOOD CAUSE

"If an employe fails either to apply for work when notified by a public employment office or to accept work when offered to him, and such failure was without good cause as determined by the commission, he shall be ineligible for the week in which such failure occurs and thereafter until he has again been employed within at least 4 weeks and has earned wages equalling at least 4 times his weekly benefit rate."

"If the commission determines that such failure has occurred with good cause, but that the employe is physically unable to work or substantially unavailable for work, he shall be ineligible for the week in which such failure occurred and while such inability or unavailability continues."

108.04 (8)(b)

"When a claimant accepts new work which he could have refused with good cause, and then terminates such employment with the same good cause and within the first 10 weeks after starting work, his eligibility for benefits based on other previous employment shall not be suspended...by reason of such termination.

"An employe shall be deemed to have good cause...if the commission determines that his failure related to new work for a new employing unit at a lower grade of skill or significantly lower rate of pay than applied to him on one or more recent jobs, and that he had not yet had a reasonable opportunity (in view of labor market conditions and his degree of skill, but not to exceed 6 weeks after he became unemployed) to seek a new job substantially in line with his job skill and prior rate of pay."

108.04 (8)(d)

"Benefits shall not be denied...to any otherwise eligible individual for refusing to accept new work under any of the following conditions:

(a) If the position offered is vacant due directly to a strike, lockout, or other labor dispute;
(b) If the wages, hours, or other conditions of work offered are substantially less favorable to the individual than those prevailing for similar work in the locality;
(c) If as a condition of being employed the individual would be required to join a company union or to resign from or refrain from joining any bona fide labor organization."

11) HE MUST NOT BE UNEMPLOYED BECAUSE OF A LABOR DISPUTE

"An employe who has left (or partially or totally lost) his employment with an employing unit because of a strike or other bona fide labor dispute shall not be eligible for benefits from such (or any previous) employer's account for any week in which such strike or other bona fide labor dispute is in active progress in the establishment in which he is or was employed."

12) HE MUST NOT BE RECEIVING "SUBSTANTIAL" RETIREMENT PAYMENTS

"If an employe claims benefits based on his past work for a covered employer, but...the commission determines that the employe is receiving or has claimed and will receive retirement payments, as to any week covered by his benefit claim, under a group retirement system to whose financing any employer has substantially contriuted or under a government retirement (or old-age insurance) system or under both, then the benefits thus claimed:

(a) Shall be denied for any such week, from the account of such employer, if the employe left his employment with that employer to retire before he reached the compulsory retirement age used by that employer.

(b) Shall not be denied for any such week, from the account of such employer, if the employe is otherwise eligible and left or lost his employment with that (or any other) employing unit because he had reached the compulsory retirement age used by the employing unit in question.

(c) Shall, if payable, be determined for any such week by treating all but $5 of the employe's weekly rate of such retirement payments as if it were 'wages.'"

13) HE MUST NOT BE RECEIVING VACATION PAY OR DISMISSAL WAGES

"'Wages' means every form of remuneration payable for a given period...to an individual for personal services, including...vacation pay, dismissal wages..."

108.02 (6)

4. What monetary benefits does the Unemployment Compensation Act provide for unemployed employes?

AMOUNT OF WEEKLY MONETARY BENEFIT

1) Weekly Benefit Rate for Total Unemployment - $11 - $38

"Each eligible employe shall be paid benefits from his employer's account for each week of his total unemployment at the weekly benefit rate, based on the employe's 'average weekly wage' from the given employer, shown by the following schedule:"

-- See the "Act" - p. 24; "Claiming UC Benefits" - p. 15 --

"An employe's 'average weekly wage' with respect to a given employer means the average weekly amount determined by dividing the employe's total wages (paid or payable with respect to his services performed for the employer in the calendar year, or other one-year period prescribed by the commission, which precedes a given determination date) by the total number of those weeks (completed in such year) within which the employe performed some wage-earning services for the employer or for which he received from the employer vacation pay or dismissal wages at least equal to his weekly benefit rate..."

2) Benefits for Partial Unemployment

"If an eligible employe's total wages for a given week are less than his applicable weekly benefit rate, but are at least one-half of said rate, he shall be paid one-half of his weekly benefit rate for such week."

108.05 (3)(a)

"If an eligible employe's total wages for a given week are less than one-half of his applicable weekly benefit rate, he shall be paid his full weekly benefit rate for such week."

108.05 (3)(b)

DURATION OF WEEKLY MONETARY BENEFIT

The number of "Weekly Benefit Rate" benefits payable to an employe on one UC determination is approximately 70% of his available credit weeks with the employer in question. It cannot, however, exceed 26½.

"Benefits to an employe shall be based on the number of his available credit weeks with respect to an employer...Based on each such credit week, the fund shall be liable to pay benefits to the employe (if otherwise eligible) in an amount equal to seven-tenths of the weekly benefit rate under the given benefit determination; except that the sum of the benefit credits thus resulting, based on all credit weeks under said determination, shall be adjusted to the nearest multiple of one-half of said weekly benefit rate."

See the schedule of "full benefit weeks" as a function of the number of "available credit weeks" in "Claiming UC Benefits" - p. 14

"There shall be counted as a credit week for benefit purposes each week of employment, of a given employe by a given employer, which is or has been completed...within the 52 weeks preceding the close of the employe's most recent week of employment by the employer..."

108.06 (1)(a)

"In case an employe has had more than 38 weeks of employment by an employer within the period specified (above)...only 38 weeks shall be counted as 'credit weeks' with respect to such employer under any one benefit determination."

Duration of liability under a UC "Benefit" determination --

"In no case shall the fund remain or be liable to pay benefits to an employe, based on his employment by a given employer, for any unemployment occurring more than 52 weeks after the close of the employe's most recent week of employment by such employer."

108.06 (3)(a)

"Once a determination has been made...as to the amount of benefits potentially payable to an employe based on his available credit weeks with respect to a given employer, all benefits thereafter payable to the employe based on credit weeks from that employer shall be paid in accordance with that determination, until it ceases to apply."

108.06 (3)(b)

"A given determination shall cease to apply only when all benefit credits available thereunder have been charged or cancelled, or as to unemployment occurring more than 52 weeks after the close of the employe's most recent credit week included in such determination."

108.06 (3)(c)

"After an employe has become eligible for a benefit check under a given benefit determination, he shall, while it remains valid... be eligible for benefits solely under that determination..."

108.07 (1)(b)

5. How is a disputed claim for unemployment compensation benefits adjudicated?

1) Employe must FILE A CLAIM FOR UC BENEFITS (UC-15).

2) Employer from whose account benefits are being claimed must APPROVE OR REJECT SUCH CLAIM IN WRITING (UC-203).

3) UC ADJUSTMENTS DEPARTMENT (Deputy) makes a UC determination on the basis of the claim "facts" obtained by the Local UC Office.

4) Deputy's Determination may be appealed to an APPEALS TRIBUNAL (UC Examiner). It conducts a Public Hearing on the claim and then issues a determination.

5) Tribunal's Determination may be appealed to the INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION for review.

6) Industrial Commission's Determination may be appealed to the CIRCUIT COURT OF DANE COUNTY for review.

7) Circuit Court's Determination may be appealed to the SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN.

   IF YOU ARE OFFERED A JOB, YOU SHOULD TAKE IT, UNLESS YOU HAVE A REASON FOR REFUSING IT WHICH WOULD BE ACCEPTED AS "GOOD CAUSE" UNDER THE LAW.

   FAILURE TO TAKE IT CAN STOP YOUR BENEFITS. (SEE 4, (BELOW.

4. WHAT HAPPENS IF YOU FAIL: -

   (A) TO APPLY FOR THE JOB?
   (B) TO BRING BACK THIS FORM?
   (C) TO TAKE A JOB OFFER?

   IF YOU DON'T HAVE "GOOD CAUSE" FOR YOUR FAILURE, THE LAW STOPS (OR POSTPONES) YOUR BENEFITS, UNTIL YOU DO GET A JOB AND (1) WORK IN 4 WEEKS AND (2) EARN 4 TIMES YOUR WEEKLY BENEFIT.

5. WHAT IS "GOOD CAUSE" FOR REFUSING, OR FAILING TO APPLY FOR, A JOB?

   THAT DEPENDS ON YOUR OWN CASE. NO FLAT ANSWER CAN BE GIVEN.

   IF YOU ARE IN DOUBT, YOU SHOULD TALK IT OVER WITH THE UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION REPRESENTATIVE. HE WON'T TELL YOU WHAT TO DO, BUT HE CAN GIVE YOU INFORMATION ABOUT LOSS OF BENEFITS TO HELP YOU DECIDE.

6. YOUR JOB PROSPECTS

   NOT EVERY WORKER WILL BE ABLE TO FIND JUST THE KIND OF JOB (AND PAY) HE WANTS.

   AND REMEMBER, WHENEVER YOU TURN DOWN ANY JOB IT MAY STOP (OR POSTPONE) YOUR UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS.

Re: 1961 Amendments to the Workmen's Compensation Act

Gentlemen:

Chapter 269, Laws of 1961, which effects certain amendments to the Wisconsin workmen's compensation act, was signed by the Governor on July 17, 1961, and was published on July 25, 1961. Both the Bill 431, S. and the Act indicate an effective date the first of the month following publication, so it becomes effective at 12:01 A.M. August 1, 1961. These amendments were recommended by the Workmen's Compensation Advisory Committee, composed of representatives of labor, industry, insurance carriers and the public. A synopsis of the changes which will apply to injuries occurring on and after August 1, 1961, are set forth below.

Subsection 102.11 (1). The maximum weekly wage for temporary disability, permanent total disability and death is increased to $85.72. This increases the maximum weekly compensation from $54 to $60, and the maximum death benefit from $15,428 to $17,144. Compensation for permanent partial disability is increased from $40 to $42.75 per week, based upon an average weekly wage of $61.07, or more.

Subsection 102.03 (2). The legislative intent that workmen's compensation shall be the exclusive remedy between the parties is clarified by adding the words "and the workmen's compensation insurance carrier" to the end of this subsection.

Subsection 102.17 (1) (as). Amendment is made to allow either verified or certified medical report.

Subsection 102.17 (4). In cases of injury or death caused by exposure to ionized radiation the statute of limitations is extended to 25 years.

Subsection 102.565. The maximum allowance for nondisabling silicosis is increased to $7,000.

Yours very truly,

Ralph E. Gintz

To the EMPLOYER:-

Please complete this required report—promptly.

Make SURE you fill in Headings 1 and 2.

(A) We need this report from you, in order to determine:-

(a) Whether this Employe has met the law's "qualifying work" requirement; and

(b) Whether he is eligible for benefits, based on his work for you; and, if so, for how much benefits.

(B) If you duly contest his claim, under Heading 4, by entering a valid "phrase" plus supporting facts, you will receive a separate determination on your issue; but only if the Employe actually claims benefits based on his work for you.

(C) If and when benefits are allowed, based on the Employe's work for you, you will receive a copy of the determination showing how much benefits he might draw, based on such work.

To the Employer:— This determination is based on your own report(s).

If you raised any eligibility issue, it has been finally determined under the law, and any disqualification imposed has been satisfied. Therefore this determination is not subject to appeal by you.

However, if you discover any error in your Benefit Liability Report(s) on which this determination is based, and wish to correct it, please write or wire at once to the Unemployment Compensation Dept., 137 East Wilson St., Madison 1, Wisconsin.

To speed any correction, give the employe's U. C. "claim-number", as shown above his last name.

(Adjustment will be made, so far as benefits then unpaid hereunder may permit.)

YOU WILL RECEIVE A COPY OF EACH BENEFIT CHECK issued under this determination.

If you offer a job to this Employe while he is drawing benefits, and he refuses it, report that fact at once. Send us a special delivery letter (addressed to Adjustment, Unemployment Compensation Dept., 137 East Wilson St., Madison 1, Wisconsin), and send a carbon copy of your letter to the Examiner at your district employment office. Instructions

Please use statutory terms in referring to fingers, such as thumbs, index, middle, ring, and little fingers, and distal, middle, and proximal joints. Where there is limitation of motion list separately the normal range of flexion in degrees, the "degrees" loss of flexion, and the "degrees" loss of extension for each joint of each finger. The Industrial Commission will evaluate the loss of use due to loss of motion of the fingers.

Where there are other elements of disability of the fingers, such as deformity, weakness, pain, or lack of endurance, give your opinion on the percentage loss of use as compared to amputation for such elements of disability and specify the joint or joints at which such loss is estimated.

RALPH E. GINTZ, DIRECTOR
WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION

Gentlemen:

We are enclosing herein copy of an application for adjustment of claim which has been filed in this office. Under the rules of practice of the commission you will be given ten days within which to admit service and make your answer to the application. One copy should be mailed to us; one copy to the applicant or his attorney if he has one; and one should be retained for your record. Unless you deny liability you should proceed to pay compensation immediately, in accordance with the provisions of the law, and not require the applicant, as well as yourself, to incur the expense, incidental to a hearing before the commission. In the meantime all compensation which is concededly due and which has accrued should be paid and the commission notified. Payments clearly due should not be withheld because application has been filed.

Yours very truly,

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION

ADMISSION OF SERVICE and ANSWER TO APPLICATION

The respondent above named, for answer to the application herein, respectfully states:

1. It is { admitted / denied } that applicant sustained an injury on or about the date set forth in the application.
2. It is { admitted / denied } that the relationship of employer and employe existed at the time of the alleged injury.
3. It is { admitted / denied } that the parties were subject to the workmen's compensation act at the time of the alleged injury.
4. It is { admitted / denied } that at the time of the alleged injury the employe was performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment.
5. It is { admitted / denied } that the accident or disease causing injury arose out of the alleged employment.
6. It is { admitted / denied } that notice of injury was given employer as specified in application.
7. It is { admitted / denied } that applicant was temporarily disabled for the period stated in application. If denied state temporary disability admitted _____
8. It is { admitted / denied } that applicant is permanently disabled to the extent for the period stated in application. If denied state permanent disability admitted _____
9. It is { admitted / denied } that the rate of wages as set forth in application is correct. If denied state weekly wage admitted _____
10. It is { admitted / denied } that the alleged employer was insured under the workmen's compensation act at the time of alleged injury.
11. State exactly what matters are in dispute between you and the applicant, and your reason for denying liability as claimed. (If any statements are found to be incorrect an amended answer may be filed.)

On the Importance of Saying, "No".

An appreciation of the core of Henry David Thoreau's Political ideas.

December 21, 1951
Robert Pickus
4520 S. Woodlawn Ave
Chicago 15, Illinois

[redacted]

Read this as the archetype of a series of reports on interviews between correspondents and German "War Criminals". In this case the criminal was an official in one of the Buchenwalds of Nazi Germany.

"Q. Did you kill people in the camp?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Did you poison them with gas?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Did you bury them alive?

"A. It sometimes happened.

"Q. Did you personally help to kill people?

"A. Absolutely not. I was only paymaster of the camp.

"Q. What did you think of what was going on?

"A. It was bad at first, but we got used to it.

"Q. Do you know the Russians will hang you?

"A. (bursting into tears) Why should they?

What have I done?"

* * * * * *

It needs more knowledge and skill than I command to fit Henry David Thoreau into the ten or fifteen pages of a course paper. Early in my reading, tangled in the contradictions of Thoreau the poet-naturalist, Thoreau the hermit, Thoreau the scholar, Thoreau the primitivist, Thoreau the writer, Thoreau the mystic, Thoreau the economist, Thoreau the man who did what he wanted,[1] I decided to limit severely the atte pt in this paper. I had intended a fairly complete treatment of Thoreau. I have settled for a discussion of what drew me to him in the first place: the core of his political ideas.

Which is, in one sense, a mistake: "All or Nothing" is a demand appropriate to Henry Thoreau's stance in the world. Most of his students recognized that this is the way Thoreau should be taken, and much of the writing on Thoreau is simply an attempt to pin him down, to say what he is. Look through any of the Thoreau bibliographies and one title form recurs. [Cf. Henry David Thoreau: "Sauvage" (Bazalgette) and Henry David Thoreau: Oriental (Fletcher)]. Again and again, the name, the colon and then the apposition, the same form, however wildly varied the final term.

Still, in giving up the atte pt to "get" the other mind whole and concentrating on what, though partial, is the heart of the matter, I am one with Thoreau. In his translations, he was concerned primarily, not with the attempt to pin down the original, but to discover that in the original which set his own mind working. In discussing the Rig Veda, he doubted "...whether a real idea or sentiment has been...transmitted to us from so primitive a period." The doubt was, for Thoreau, unimportant, for "I do not care where I get my ideas or what suggests them."[2] — Which is not the approach of the careful scholar, not even the scholar who comes to his work with an end beyond understanding what the other mind meant. For Thoreau that further end, "truth", was always a personal exploration.

in which other minds may furnish the occasion for progress but never are such in themselves. Thus Thoreau, a less than excellent classic scholar, but a compelling, creative mind. ~~Surely a worthy model.~~

The beginning though, in this course paper, must be an attempt to state clearly what seems to me to be the core of Thoreau's political ideas. I want, further, to examine the roots of these ideas in Thoreau's life and writings, and finally, to give my reasons for believing these ideas to be of particular value in meeting the political problems of our time, and a permanently important contribution to American political theory.

The Heart of the Matter

Some mark Thoreau's ideas as "non-political". Most of the current definitions of the subject matter of "politics" draw lines which do in fact exclude Thoreau. He would be the last to object! Witness the blast at the end of Life Without Principle, beginning with "What is called politics is comparatively so superficial and inhuman that practically I have never fairly recognized that it concerns me at all", and ending with the "dyspeptic analogy". (Did he mean a fart or a belch? In any case, either "expression" covers Henry Thoreau's definition of what most men call politics!) But he should object; his objections to the division of labor apply with equal vigor to the narrow and stultifying effects of the intellectual division which would separate the description of how men act politically from the centuries old discussion of how men should act and organize communally. Thoreau is not a power theoretician. ~~xxxx

But he does make judgments on the key problems men interested in political thought have always discussed.

---He has his ~~xxx~~ own "contract theory", as in his "signing off" the church rolls:

> "'Know all men by these presents, that I, Henry Thoreau, do not wish to be regarded as a member of any incorporated society which I have not joined.'... The State having thus learned that I did not wish to be regarded as a member of that Church has never made a like demand on me since... If I had known how to name them, I should then have signed off in detail from all the societies which I never signed on to; but I did not know where to find a complete list." (C.D., p. 649)

> "The authority of government...is still an impure one: to be strictly just it must have the sanction and consent of the governed. It can have no pure right over my person but what I concede to it." (C.D., p.659)

---A definition of the best state:

> "There will never be a really free and enlightened state until the state comes to recognize the individual as a higher and independent power from which all its own power and authority are derived, and treats him accordingly.... A state which can afford to be just to all men and to treat the individual with respect as a neighbor; which even would not think it inconsistent with its own repose if a few were to live aloof from it, not meddling with it, nor embraced by it, who fulfilled all the duties of neighbors and fellow-men. A state which bore this kind of fruit, and suffered it to drop off as fast as it ripened, would prepare the way for a still more perfect and glorious State, which also I have imagined but not yet anywhere seen." (C.D., p. 659)

---Judgments on the relation of conventional and ~~moral~~ Natural law:

> "The law will never make men free; it is men who have got to make the law free. They are the lovers of law and order ~~to~~ who observe the law when the government breaks it... Whoever can discern truth has received his commission from a higher source than the chiefest justice in the world who can discern only law." (Slavery, p. 669)

> "What is wanted is men not of policy but of probity--who recognize a higher law than the Constitution, or the decision of the majority." (Slavery, p. 674)

> (In praise of John Brown) "He did not recognize unjust human laws, but resisted them as he was bid." (Plea, p. 695)
> "In cases of highest importance it is of no consequence whether a man breaks a human law or not." (Plea, p. 706)

---A clear position on the question of progress toward the good society (as in his review of J. A. Etzler's book on a mechanical Utopia). For Thoreau, perfection of society will come as increase is given to the importance of love in men's lives, which, says Thoreau, "the wisest men in all ages have labored to publish... yet how little is it adually applied to social ends!" And "In this matter of reforming the world we have little faith in coporations... Nothing can be effected but by one man... We must first succeed alone that we may enjoy our success together."

Brush this off as "preachment", define political thought so that ~~the~~ these ideas lie beyond its purlieu and you exclude more than Henry Thoreau. The history of political theory includes more than the attempt to describe man's political life, or to understand the regularities in the shifts of power. It is also the story of man's constant attempt to define the good life in social terms and to indicate the way in which that good life can be achieved. In this wider older definition of the attempt at "political" thought, Thoreau holds an honorable and important position..

It is not however the accents of the moral philosopher in Thoreau that rouses the ire of many people active in thinking about or dealing with political problems. They know what he says is relevant to their field. They know well, how often in their own experience and in the world's history men proceeding on the strength of ideas like those quoted above, have been at the center of crucial power shifts in the state. No, the heart of their objection to Thoreau is not "irrelevance", or "moralist", but the opposite of the last term. They think him immoral.

"Henry Thoreau", they would say, " is politically irresponsible."

I believe Thoreau's conception of political responsibility to be the single most valuable contribution he has to make to political thought; certainly his major statements on political matters center on this problem. Ask Henry Thoreau how a man should act in relation to other men in society so as to be morally and rationally accountable in highest degree and he has a very clear answer.

First, he would say: Recognize that you are responsible for what you do and never attempt to burke that responsibility under cover of "respect for the law".

> "Must the citizen ever for a moment or in the least degree, resign his conscience to the legislator? Why has every man such a conscience then? I think that we should be men first and subjects afterward. It is not desirable to cultivate respect for the law, so much as respect for the right." (C.D...637)

> "It is not a mans duty, as a matter of course, to devote himself to the eradication of any, even the most enormous wrong;.... but it is his duty, at least to wash his hands of it, and, if he gives it no thought longer, not to give it practically his support. (C.D.....642)

Then, concentrate on being, not on "Doing good", or being merely a good ~~citizen~~ citizen. See for example, the ending to his essay on philanthropy in Walden which, after this summary, (P.71) "Do not stay to be an overseer of the poor, but endeavour to become one of the worthies of the world." explains thru the words of Sadi, a Sufi poet, what a "worthy" of the world is. In the same section of Walden, he points the tragedy and waste that would attend, for example, the attempt of the Sun to "do good", instead of merely "increasing his genial heat and benificence, till he is of such brightness that no mortal can look him in the face" and going in his own orbit, letting the "world go about him, getting good". Or still more clearly, though Thoreau calls it obscure, in his conclusion to Walden, which encourages men to "direct your eye right inward" , to "maintain (yourself) in whatever attitude(you)find (yourself) through obedience to the laws of (your) being." To, in sum, strive for perfection as does Thoreau's artist of Kouroo; for, says Thoreau, "I do not value chiefly a mans uprightness and benevolence, which are, as it were, his stem and leaves. I want the flower and fruit of a man...fragrance....wafted over from him to me. His goodness must not be a partial and transitory act, but a constant superfluity, which costs him nothing." (Walden P.69)

It is in the existence and multiplication of men like these that we shall find the good society says Thoreau.

> " The fate of the country does not depend on how you vote at the polls.. ...on what kind of paper you drop into the ballot box once a year, but on what kind of man you drop from your chamber into the street every morning." (Slavery..674)

> " We are accustomed to say that the mass of men are unprepared. but improvement is slow because the few are not materially wiser or better than the many. It is not so important that many should be as good as you, as that there be some absolute goodness somewhere..." (C.D. .640)

It comes to a simple summation: "Society is full of folly and will deceive us in the matter of humanity. It is an unreliable horse and blind in the bargain. Woe to the driver if he falls asleep." (Albert Schweitzer)

Thoreau refuses to idealize society, to leave ethics to the social mechanism. F.O. Matthiessen, despite what appears at times ask a complex Marxist bias, defends "individualist" Thoreau, and refutes the charge that Thoreau completely rejects all institutions. (Witness Thoreau himself: Civilization he says, involves institutions " in which the life of the individual is to a great extent absorbed in order to preserve and perfect the life of the race.". Matthiessen, points out that Thoreau was insisting, not on the rejection of that absorbtion, but on the imperative to examine the terms on which the absorbtion is made. It is not enough to say Thoreau was an individualist. " Unlike those who call themselves no government men, I ask for not at once, no governemnt, but at once a better governement." (C.D. 636) The very core of his political ideas lie in an adjudgement of the importance of the individual, socially. He said, in sum, that the final reservoir of human values, was, has, and always will be, the conscience of individual men.

His Roots

> " To tell the truth, I saw an advertisement for able bodied seamen when I was a boy sautering in my native port, and as soon as I came of age, I embarked" (Life ...715)

> "You will, pardon some obscurities, for there are more secrets in my trade, than in most mens', and yet not voluntarily kept, but inseparable from its very nature." ....."I long ago lost a hound, a bay horse, and a turtledove and am still on their trail."

Ethel Seybold's book, "Thoreau: The Quest and the Classics", seems to me the clearest, and F.O. Matthiessens the most complex though adequate statement of the simple fact that so many students of Thoreau seem to have avoided or half understood: He was a mystic. Seybold in a very detailed study of Thoreau's use of the classics, shows how his classical studies were only a tool in his larger investigation: the search for spiritual reality, which was the center of his life. FO. Matthiessen interested in the secret of life, the quality of illumination that are the roots of Thoreaus' literary reputation, points to his mastery of the union of the concrete and the absract as the distinctive quality of his style. Always, says Matthiessen, there is a mystical element in Thoreau's writing, yet even when "swept beyond the moments of physical sensation, he did not forget his debt to them." This "check reign of the senses", says Matthiessen, constitutes his chief asset as an artist. When Matthiessen writes under the heading, "What Music Shall We Have?", of Thoreau's reaction to sound, of "the analogy of the pulses" (Thoreau's and natures') as central to Thoreau's experience of the world and his attempt in writing, the quality of Thoreau's search becomes crystal clear.

But you don't need the extraordinary perceptiveness and fertility of a mind like F.O. Matthiessen's or the clear careful statement of Ethel Seybold to make evident the nature Of Thoreau's quest and its importance in all his judgements. He tells you. Again and again, with a persistence and clarity rarely achieved by travelers on this road, lamenting philosophically the necessary obscurity, he does, nevertheless, try and tell you what he is about. He seldom describes any striking experience without making the tie to the mystics quest: as in his disgust with California and Australian gold-diggers, "Is not our native soil auriferous? Does not a stream from the golden mountains flow thru our native valley? and has not this for more than geologic ages been bringing down the shining particles and forming nuggets for us? (Life....720). Or again in his many nature analogies, using growth and design in the universe to interpret the personal exploration of a man seeking to realize his spiritual nature:

"The life in us is like the water in the river. It may rise this year higher than man has ever known it and flood the parched uplands; even this may be the eventful year which will drown out all our muskrats"

It is there, right at the heart of Walden: his description of where he lived and what he lived for

"to be ~~abiwb~~ awake is to be alive. I have never yet met a man who was quite awake. How could I have looked him in the face." (Walden. .81)

"I perceive that we inhabitants of New England live this mean life that we do because our vision does not penetrate the surface of things. We think that is , which appeasto be...We are enabled to apprehend at all what is sublime and noble only by the perpetual instilling and drenching of the reality that surrounds us." (Walden.. 87)

It is at the center of the "Week"

"I see, smell, taste, hear, feel that everlasting Something to which we are allied...." (Week...364)

All of "Walking" is clearly an analogy of the quest; but enough, the important point in this paper is the relevance of this mystics view of the world and life to Thoreau's political judgements. It is, I believe, essential, providing the base and frame for all he says. It is his answer to those who point the evil in man, the terrible division of the will to live against itself so that inherent in society are the pressures and immoralities that make law, tradition and authority the only guard against a life " nasty, brutish and short". From this point of view Thoreau's view of man is incredibly shallow and romantic; it ignores the key eleement in the landscape Thoreau - a surveyor, who should know better - is trying to describe. It ignores what men are like; what, in fact, would be the effects of each man putting himself above the law.

Thoreau knew men. It is difficult to understand how anyone reading "Life Without Principle" or "Walden" could charge him with a sentimental or romantic view of "John or Jonathan". According to Channing, his favorite quotation was, "Unless above himself he can/ erect himself/ how poor a thing is man "

Thoreau knew men, but he knew something else too. He found it in the purity and sweetness of the water lily, "What confirmation of our hopes...if Nature can compound this fragrance still annually, I shall believe her integrity amd genius unimpaired, and that there is virtue even in man too, who is fitted to perceive and I love it." He found it in the forest, " Every little pine needle expanded and swelled with sympathy and befriended me. I was so distinctly made aware of the presence of something kindred to me" . In another phrase, the echo of "What Music Shall we Have?" he asked "What do we want most to dwell near to?".

Thoreau knew the answer for himself, and almost all his writing -this journal keeper's - was an attempt to tell men his answer and the way in which he forged it.

Thoreau subscribed to the whole lexicon of the perennial mystic. He believed in a spiritual reality underlying the phenomenal world of matter and individualized consciousness. He believed that human beings were capable not merely of perceiving but of uniting with this reality and he believed, despite an occasional demur, bidding each man follow "his own" genius, that men should seek this reality, develop that of it which is in them, until they become, in truth, "realized" men, who having lived, could die and not " deliquesce like fungi"; who having realized them selves spiritually could live together in society as men have always dreamed, "But not yet anywhere seen."

That such men are rare, Thoreau knew all too well. He bid those "Who know of no purer source of truth, who have traced up its stream no higher, (to) stand, and wisely stand, by the Bible and the Constitution and drink at it there with reverence and humility; but they who behold where it comes trickling into this lake or that pool, gird up their loins once more and continue their pilgrimage toward its fountainhead."

It is to the man who has perceived a higher truth and is himself disciplined by it that Thoreau speaks. "High treason," he says in the "Plea", "when it is resistance to tyranny here below, has its origin in and is first committed by, the power that makes and forever recreates man." Thoreau knew the value, politically, of the kind of spiritual independece that enables a man to stand out against the powers of this world.

Because he believes in the light in all men, he believes what he says has some relevance for all men, "What right have you to enter into a compact with yourself that you will do thus and so against the light within you?". Thoreau did believe in a moral universe, "any man knows when he is justified, and all the wits in the world cannot enlighten him on that point". Though he had a very clear perception of the imperfections of man and the necessary imperfections of the social mechanism, he would have no patience with the kind of modern theology that sets about justifying them. "Thus", he has already said, " men will lie on their backs, talking about the fall of man, and never make an effort to get up."

He is a man of principle, a civil disobeyer when necessary, because his roots were outside society. This mind and this self were formed in other waters than G.H. Mead's. True and important, or dangerous and the only successful kind of insanity, he stands on this world view.

A Whisper in the Ear of Daniel Boorstin

> "While this America heavily thickening to empire settles in the mould of her vulgarity; and protest, a bubble in the molten mass, pops and sighs and dies out and the mass hardens....."

All the main currents of political thought are now authoritarian. Across half the globe the most powerful human communities are moving toward a heirarchic, regimented society, in which the individual, dominated by vast mechanisms, that in theory speak his voice, becomes not simply a slave, but, shaped by modern methods of terror and propaganda, the author of his own enslavement.; which is not to derogate the important differences still remaining, but only to point the terrible unity of direction.

In such a climate it is difficult to accept the wisdom of the conservative political thinker. For his truths are twisted to fit the end of communal self adulation, his warnings become the justification for the increasingly rigid pattern of conformity essential to an authoritarian society. Yet, in such a climate, thinking which is primarily historical, in that it would use history to justify the institutional present and to decry the individual attempt to challenge that present by seeking roots outside history, finds a ready audience. A five page announcement spread and an extra run of 10,000 for John Dos Passos come lately discovery of the value of our institutions or more seriously, a likely publishers welcome for a scholarly University of Chicago attempt to develop a conservative theory of American political practice and ideas. But no room for the political ideas of Henry Thoreau!

I believe we had better make room. There is something wrong with our Western (I include Russia) civilization, something terrible, radically wrong; far too radically wrong to admit of solution thru any theory of institutions or any political, in the sense of power, thinking. I believe Henry Thoreau restated the only set of ideas which offers us a chance of fronting and besting the kind of evil that dominates political life in all the "great" powers today. Thoreau offers only a beginning, but a beginning fundamental to the positive institutional planning to meet war and totalitarianism, that many recognize as necessary. Missing Thrpeau's message few will act on their recognition; most in their complicity with the main drift of our times will in effect deny their knowledge.

Thoreau says simply that it is not men's particular institutional arrangements, but the human spirit drawing on its best resources that keeps men human.

"Denumanization", a terrible word, does in fact describe the effect of many of our present institutional arrangements. Surrounded by ostensibly civilized cultures willing to rely on genocide as a weapon of war, do you hear the faint, faint protest? And how much of it comes thru the regular political channels? All we sense as individuals and much of what modern social science has to teach us, tends to verify Thoreau's distrust of the idea of protest and progress thru the usual political channels. It has become, I would think, sufficiently clear that any genuine attempt to modify the course of events must have as its base a personal committment - a reassertion of our own responsibility toward other men.. For our present situation, Alex Comfort puts it well.

"If you forget your humanity and exchange its daily expression as a human being....for abstract loyalties, it is a matter of accident whether you find yourself in the end as bomber or victim, prisoner or guard."

There is a possible error in Thoreau's conception of political responsibility. The kind of spiritual independence that nerves a man to say "no" to the power of the state does make it difficult for him to work "responsibly". Cyril Connolly, announcing, "the pleasure gardens of the West are closing", published the last issue of Horizon - the outstanding English cultural magazine of the 40's - a year or so ago. The whole issue, marked by the most profound discouragement and depression in its recognition of the main drift of our times, did nevertheless carry a story, which points Thoreau's possible error. Titled, "The Boy Who Wrote "No"", the story, by James Lord, is a chilling reminder of the dead end, the sterility, the personal disaster that often attends the refusal to accept the institutional framework within which you must live and work.

There is an error in saying no. But what of the other error: the average citizen troubled, but accepting, who participates in acts that would have disgusted Ghengiz Khan, because he has "no choice", because he cannot conceive of his personal, political responsibility; what of, for example, the paymaster, at Buchenwald whose interview opened this paper?

Which error is the greater? Which error is after all the prevalent one today; the saint's error which Thoreau states, or the paymaster's? Are there so many who in their attempt to clear their conscience, cut the selves off? Are there even many, still sufficiently senstive, to attempt -having abandoned the attempt to clear their conscience - to bear their conscience with dignity?

Far from "individualist", or "socially irresponsible", Thoreau's case is in good part based on the reflection in the individual of something in the social nature of the species. To catch this reflection, to live responsibly in its light, is Thoreau's charge. Doing so, will, he believes, advance us toward the kind of society that has been our constant dream.

Failing to do so, in this 20th century, can the western world avert catastrophe?

If the answer is no, if we do fail and our failure brings the collapse of our civilization, Thoreau's charge remains the important one. To paraphrase Augustine, the great question both from the standpoint of history and from the the standpoint of eternity, will still be whether there are some who will be citizens of the city of God, whose foundation stone is love, rather than devotees of the City of this World which seems able to dominate and destroy all, but is itself "destroyed by its own lust for power".

W C & Lib Ed.

An old argument (on how to teach) but in context of workers ed.

Functional approach to ed. — and functionalism includes liberal ed. But there is only so much time, energy & motivation available as well as only so much time left in the world (this is lib. ed. focus) — but how do we get the job done —

Not so much a phil. debate as a how to do — certainly would not want all lib. ed. to start in an W. C.

Workmen's Compensation and the Liberal Education of Workers(adults, union members)

If the question is asked, "Is it more important to teach about the common law than (if a choice must be made) about the practical procurrment of benefits?", the ansewr should obviously be no. The negative applies for two reasons: 1) the ethical requirement to stick to the agreed upon knitting and 2) that a discussion of the procurrment of rights is more immediate in interest, concrete in expression, and more lively for a consideration of the fundamantel forces at play and thereby a better tool for liberal education than a discussion of the common law backgrounds.

Now obviously it is being argued that there be an appropriate mix of emphases. But it (appropriate) means that priority is given to should be equally obvious that that the first emphasis must be placed on what we normally term the practical aspects of the subject.

Federalism and the foreign visitor: ILl - Wis, the differences, but almotrue for the class of US citizens.

I am not "above" asking the braod question in class or of thereizing. I will admit that some bread questions recieve no profitable answers.

In labor education circles you will semi still hear a humorous use of the reference mad to the statement "nothing is too good for the workers". Under such a banner all manner of deeds might conceivably be wrought. I would suggest that it is worth contemplating a correlary(which math term do I want) which would be "Philosphy is not good enough for the workers."

One Aim (Unstated): To spread some of the W. C. practical facts among Ed. Educators: e.g. could say Important for teachers understanding and his identification with class to know a great deal beyond legal provisions — that in some jurisdictions a plate the M.D's available at restricted that the failure to have witnesses when co. does its work's accident may be covered, that some Co's may have the therapy made on the health plan rather than W. Founding and Purpose of Our Organization:

Several months ago three concerned ministers took it upon themselves to marshal together the concerned clergymen of Atlanta in order to more effectly combat the forces of oppression, discrimination and injustice heaped upon the black, the poor and the underprivileged of the city of Atlanta. Our aim was to gather together action oriented ministers with out regard to type of church, color of ministers and the beliefs peculiar to them. It was and still is our conviction that the responsibility for leadership aimed at providing social justice rest principally upon the corporate voice of the ministry as much as upon government.officials.

We readily recognize that we have, generally speaking, in the past shirked this most important responsibility, but now feel compelled to move to the front, thus humbly accepting the role in which we have been cast by the Almighty. We are no longer content to be an echo of the concensus of our following. Similarly, we have begun to act rather than react. In short, we feel compelled to assume our prophetic role as did the Prophet Amos as he said: "Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, Saying, When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small, and the shekel great, and falsifying the balances by deceit?...Hear this word, ye ine of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor, which crush the needy, which say to this masters, Bring, and let us drink...Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate: it may be that the Lord God of hosts will be gracious unto the remnant of Joseph...But let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream." (Amos 3:4-6, 4:1, 5:15,24)

Our Membership:

Our numbers are increasing from week to week and at present show promise of becoming a force that will number in the hundreds. The ministers of our organization minister to the needs of better than 50,000 church members every week. Of the forty-four ministers who are active in our group more than one-third are Negro. The Churches represented include Roman Catholic, Southern Baptist, United Methodist, Church of Christ, Episcopal, American Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian, Salvation Army, Lutheran and Christian. We feel that it is extremely important that our group always maintain and include a very broad cross section of the ministry. The reasoning behind this is to guard against accusations that we speak for and in behalf of any narrow racial or sectarian group. It is our hope that our makeup, actions, and pronouncements will be of such character that we will be thought to be the conscience of the community rather than the spokesmen of special interest groups.

Our Most Significant Work To Date:

Several weeks ago we under took to make an investigation of the pricing and practices of ghetto area supermarkets. It was thought that some of these stores were offering inferior merchandise and charging relatively exorbitant prices. Investigations indicated that one of the worst offenders was a ghetto chain that operated four stores in largely black communities. Further investigation revealed that meats and produce in their stores were frequently below health department minimum standards and that prices, even on brand name items, averaged being 20-30% higher priced than those offered to suburban dwellers. The cleanliness of the facilities and customer service was also inferior to that usual to suburban stores. In order to correct this injustice we decided to meet with the area manager of these stores. The first confrontation led to token improvements, but far from appropriate justice. The second confrontation, however, between the management of these stores and our group brought the following results:

1. Pledge to bring prices, quality and variety of goods into line with the major suburban chain stores.
2. Pledge to institute and maintain sanitary standards normal to the industry.
3. Pledge to hire or appoint one black store manager and four black assistant store managers.
4. Pledge to elevate the wages of store employees to that of the rest of the industry.
5. Pledge to return a portion of the profits derived from these four stores to a charity designed to benefit the ghetto community.

The conservative value of these concessions is estimated to be well over $200,000/annum.

Organizational Needs:

In order to preserve that which has been done thus far and to move on to other areas of injustice, we are in need of certain things which are:

1. Researchers and data gathers to enable us to draw valid conclusions before embarking upon remedialy oriented action.

2. An office apart from any of our member churches to maintain neutrality and facilitate communication between our membership.

3. Recruiters and organizers to expand the Atlanta organization and establish counterparts throughout the rest of the Nation in order to intensify and diversify the ministerial cry for social justice.

Potential For Our Organization:

The voice of the ministry crying for social justice adds a new dimension to the fight against poverty and discrimination. Laws, riots, noble public officials, sit-ins and federal programs all have contributed greatly to the alleviation of our social ills, but none of these offers the potential possible from viable ministerial leadership. Fear of financial loss, personal harm and legal reprisal have their place in motivating men, but none of these appeals to man's higher instincts.

The most lasting and significant changes wrought throughout the history of man have been spiritually motivated. Such is the potential of a group of truly concerned clergymen. It is obvious that the voice of hundreds will be much more effective than forty-four and, likewise, obvious that voices from many cities will be much more effective than from one.

RFK Memorial Created To Fight Poverty, Crime

By JEAN HELLER

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., announced Tuesday the creation of a Robert F. Kennedy foundation to work in areas of poverty, crime and education as "a living memorial" to his assassinated brother.

The $10-million foundation, to be called the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial, will be "an action-oriented program that we think will carry on his concerns, his actions, his efforts to work on so many of the problems in this country that have no solutions," Kennedy said.

He made the announcement at a news conference on the sprawling back lawn of Robert Kennedy's McLean, Va., estate, Hickory Hill.

He was flanked by his sisters, Patricia Kennedy Lawford and Jean Kennedy Smith, and surrounded by dozens of family friends and aides.

Robert Kennedy's widow, Ethel, did not appear, but said in a statement that she feels the memorial will "carry forward the ideals and carry on the work so important in the life of my husband."

"He wanted to encourage the young people and to help the disadvantaged and discriminated against both here and abroad, and he wanted to promote peace in the world," she said. "These will be the goals of the memorial."

No specific foundation projects were outlined but Kennedy said there will be an announcement "of some significance within the next few weeks."

Memorial funds, which will be raised through donations, will be used on projects in the areas of poverty, education, housing, crime and violence in this country and poverty and hunger abroad, Kennedy said.

Robert S. McNamara, former secretary of defense and now president of the World Bank, will act as chairman of the executive committee of the memorial. Thomas J. Watson, chairman of the board of IBM, is finance chairman and Frederick G. Dutton, former assistant secretary of state under President John F. Kennedy, is the memorial's director.

Honorary cochairmen are Mr. and Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy, Robert's parents.

Four Georgians were named to the committee. They were Mrs. Martin Luther King Jr., John Lewis of the Southern Regional Council, State Rep. Julian Bond and the Rev. Andrew Young, executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Lewis, who attended the announcement ceremony Tuesday, is also a member of the executive committee.

Gentlemen:

Shortly after the death of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., a white concerned preacher called two white preacher friends together to analyze the position of the clergy in the American society. It was the concensus of these three preachers that 1) the clergy, generally speaking, has failed to assume its proper role in the fight for social justice and human rights, 2) the Country is heading in a frightful direction and disaster is almost certain if many trends are not reversed, and 3) the best hope for a socially redeemed America is its collective religious leadership.

With these assumptions as a base these three men set out to marshall together the religious leadership of Atlanta in order to begin the burdensome job that was so sadly lacking. Letters were sent and calls were made to contact and arouse the interest of their fellow ministers. The only rigid guideline used was that no religious group should be excluded. As a result of these activities the Concerned Clergy of Atlanta came into being. As of November 15, 1968 the group numbered among its participants better than 50 black and white pastors, priests, ministers, rabbis, etc. with an average of three to five new ones joining each week. It has become a rather loose knit, self supporting, socially active force which has been and must be reckoned with.

Several months ago the group began investigating the practices of a small food store chain that operated exclusively in the ghetto communities of Atlanta. It was learned that the stores in question charged higher prices and offered poorer merchandise than their suburban counterparts. Also it was learned that the store's facilities were definitely sub-standard in cleanliness and in many cases unsanitary. Even though the clientel in these stores was better than 90% Negro, there were no Negro managers. The inequities were capped by the knowledge that the profits from these stores went to help support a plush segregated rest home.

With these facts in mind the Concerned Clergymen began discussions with the manager of these stores. After six weeks of promises followed by broken promises, the Concerned Clergy voted to initiate a boycott of their four ghetto stores. In less than four days the management of these stores entered into an agreement with the Concerned Clergy as follows:

We, (Buehler's) hereby agree:

1. To bring prices, quality and variety of goods offered into line with the Atlanta rea Kroger, Big Apple, Colonial and A & P stores as well as with the Associated Grocer stores. This will include all items, commonly carried including name brand items. In this matter we agree to accept the impartial judgement of a professor of Economics at Georgia State. We agree to bring our prices back into line in all areas determined by this professor where the Buehler Stores may not be truly competitive.

2. We agree to equalize the prices and quality of all merchandise offered among the four Atlanta area Buehler Stores. We will have the same variety of goods in all Atlanta area stores with the exception of dry goods at our Broad Street Store which must be limited due to lack of space.

3. We agree to the best of our ability to maintain the cleanliness of all our stores. We will encourage our customers and the Concerned Clergy of Atlanta to inspect our stores and report any violations to the general manager, who will immediately correct the situation. Within 10 days all our stores will be brought up to the standards of cleanliness.

4. We agree that as of December 1, 1963 the Manager of the Broad St. store will be black--Mr. George Shinhotster. He will have complete supervision of this store subject only to the General District Manager of all our Atlanta area stores. His salary and bonuses will be equal to our other store managers. We agree to upgrade immediately three black assistant managers or Department Heads who will be equal to our other assistant managers and department heads as to salary and responsibility. They will be Mr. William Gardner, Mr. John Whittersen, Mr. Theo Jackson and at a future date we will employ three as yet unnamed management trainees.

5. We agree that our employee benefits will be:

On employment the Buehler stores will pay 75% of the premium on a $2000.00 Life Insurance policy.

If an employee agrees after 90 days of employment, the Buehler stores will pay 50% of the cost of a Hospitalization Plan. Our present plan is with the Occidental Life Insurance Co paying $20.00 a day for hospital room, surgical fees and after $100.00 deductible 80% of all major medical and weekly sick benefits, except for pregnancy. The present policy is inadequate for female heads of households. We will review our present policy and will include the dependents of working women without husbands.

Vacation will be one week for each of the first 2 years and two weeks per year thereafter.

A leave of absence will be granted up to 90 days after the birth of a child.

In case of a death in the immediate family of a part-time employee who has had one (1) year of continuous service, or any full-time employee (one year of continuous service not required) the employee will be paid for a reasonable period of absence, depending upon the circumstances but not to exceed (3) days, provided he attends the funeral. In no case will he receive more than his normal week's pay. "Immediate family" shall mean spouse, parent, mother-in-law, father-in-law, child brother, sister, grandparents or any relative residing with the employee.

We will request the Buehler Foundation to research the possibility of instituting a retirement plan for the Atlanta area employees.

WAGE SCALE: FULL-TIME EMPLOYEES

We agree that the minimum wage at the time of employment of all our full-time employees will be a $1.75 an hour. The minimum wage after six months will be $1.81 an hour. After 18 months the basic minimum for full-time employees will be $1.88 an hour. After 3 years the minimum will be $1.95 an hour. After 4 years the minimum will be $2.00 an hour.

This wage scale will be applicable to the present seniority of all Buehler employees.

WAGE SCALE: PART-TIME EMPLOYEES

Part-time employees under 29 hours will receive a minimum of $1.30 an hour with the exception of part-time high school students under 18 years of age with a work permit from the school will receive a minimum of $1.39 an hour.

Over 40 hours each employee below managerial status will receive time and a half for overtime.

6. The capacity (191) of the Buehler Home of Peoria, Illinois will be maintained and the next five vacancies will be filled by black residents. If no black applicants are available those vacancies will be reserved until five black applicants be accepted to the home, and a report will be given to the Concerned Clergy every three months as to the progress. This progress must reach 10% black before black applicants are not given special preference.

The value of this agreement to the ghetto area shoppers, the store employees, the black community as a whole and the aged applying to the rest home is inestimable, but significant to say the least. At present the Concerned Clergy of Atlanta is broadening its activities to include all the ghetto area food stores and has also begun to investigate the practices of lending institutions serving ghetto area residents.

All of the foregoing is the background upon which this appeal for funds is being made. It is not our purpose to request funds to finance the work of the Concerned Clergy for they are pledged to their own support. The appeal for funds is for the purposes of expanding the membership of the Atlanta group, establishing like groups all across the country and providing communication and coordination among such groups. It only stands to reason that if one such group can accomplish so much in so short a time that many such groups in cooperation with one another might provide the impetus for the social redemption of America.

Our needs for funds therefore may be classified as follows:

1. Office space, equipment, help and services.
2. Printing, supplies and communication equipment.
3. Staff recruiters, coordinators and administrators.
4. Travel and transportation expense for staff workers.

The amount and extent of our budget will be limited and governed by the funds made available.

Tentative First-Year Budget

Office Space	$ 3,000
Office Equipment	3,000
Secretarial & Clerical Help (2)	10,000
Office Supplies	2,500
Telephones	5,000
Printing	4,000
Travel Expenses (for staff & volunteers)	28,000
Staff Recruiters & Administrators (4)	32,000
Office Expenses	2,500
Unforeseen Expenses	10,000
	$100,000

It is estimated that this staff could assist in the organization of from twnety-five to fifty chapters per year and maintain communication and coordination among the several chapters. We hope that these funds required may be acquired from several different sources in order to help us maintain a posture of impartiality and non-sectarianism.

Although this organization, to be known as Concerned Clergy of America, will work very closely with the Concerned Clergy of Atlanta and the Concerned Clergy of other cities, it is not proposed that there be any organic ties. The Concerned Clergy of each city would finance their own activities receiving assistance from Concerned Clergy of America only in the areas of literature, recruiting, communication and coordination.

The Concerned Clergy of America, it is proposed, would be governed by an ecumenical-type board with appropriate representation from white and black as well as protestant and catholic ministers. The operations would be under the direction of an executive director who would operate within the framework of a budget approved by the board and any other special allowances made by the board. Your kind consideration is appreciated.

Introduction by Harry S. Ashmore

The character and personal style of Edward Lamb are reflected in the title he chose for his recent autobiography: No Lamb for Slaughter. The range of his interests is indicated by an early chapter in that work, "Practicing Law Can Be Dangerous," and another toward the end, "The Art of Making Money."

Lamb took a full measure of the hazards of his profession as a young labor lawyer skirmishing on the civil liberties front in the Depression years. His mastery of the financial arts is manifest in Lamb Enterprises, a multi-million-dollar personal holding company currently controlling such corporate giants as Seiberling Rubber Company.

The two careers of Edward Lamb are linked by an epic trial, which saw an agency of the federal government exhuming the first in an effort to halt the second. The form of his ordeal was a hearing before the Federal Communications Commission, but the substance was the evil compound of innuendo, guilt by association, and venal political practice that has come to be called McCarthyism.

As a contemporary hero of the market-place, Lamb is regularly called upon these days to enlighten the students of the most conservative schools of business administration. The young men who avidly take notes on his standard lecture, "How to Make a Buck," might find even greater utility in sober contemplation of the fact that such an entrepreneur could have been formally branded a Red enemy of capitalism, and thereby rendered unfit to hold broadcasting licenses in his native Ohio. The most critical investment Lamb ever made was the $900,000 his government forced him to spend simply to clear his name.

Although it was a cause célèbre less than ten years ago, the Lamb Case has largely passed from the national consciousness. In February, 1964, Time magazine published an article respectfully reviewing the manner in which Lamb achieved his estimated current worth of $50,000,000. No mention was made of the tortured months he spent in a Washington hearing room, cast in the nation's headlines as the wanton villain of "a spy melodrama, soap opera, and detective story all wrapped up in one package."

A more conventional financier might be content to let the record of that trial rest quietly in the archives. But Lamb believes the bizarre history points a moral and provides a warning. Certainly the basic issues he raised in the course of his spectacular defense have maintained an unhappy currency.

The Lamb Case dramatically exposed the systematic use of professional witnesses by government agencies dealing with alleged subversion, and as a direct result the practice virtually has been halted in the federal service. Yet many of these hired character assassins went off the federal payroll only to find similar employment with official agencies in the Southern states, where the Red smear technique is still industriously employed against those who support the Negro rights movement. In 1959 I encountered a road company operating under the aegis of Attorney General Bruce Bennett of Arkansas, and wrote this summary comment in an editorial in the Arkansas Gazette:

"Mr. Bennett's latest campaign document is an alleged report on the findings of his recent televised 'hearing' on subversion in Arkansas. The first eight pages of this tract consist of the political speech Mr. Bennett made in opening the investigation. The remainder is a heavily edited distillation of the testimony given by a collection of professional witnesses Mr. Bennett imported to read into the record the same discredited charges they had made before similar committees in Louisiana, Florida and elsewhere. The bellwether of this troupe was J. B. Matthews, a reformed radical who was fired from a Senate investigating committee upon the insistence of Senator John McClellan of Arkansas after he made a blanket attack upon the Protestant clergy of the nation.

"In every instance in which these hired witnesses (Mr. Matthews collected upwards of $900 from the state) made charges of subversion against persons still resident and identifiable in Arkansas, the charges were publicly denied. Yet no one of the accused, although readily available to Mr. Bennett and in most cases obviously anxious to testify under oath, was called to the stand."

In Alabama the embattled segregationist governor, George C. Wallace, is currently backing up his strong-arm state troopers with a set of McCarthy-style dossiers. On February 9, 1964, the Birmingham News reported under a Montgomery date line:

"Alabama's Department of Public Safety is amassing a formidable collection of 'criminal files' for use —if 'needed'—in keeping tabs of supposed suspicious persons and groups. Gov. George C. Wallace has endorsed the move. . . .

"The Department's files have been expanded to include records of supposedly questionable or controversial newspapers, magazines, radio and TV corporations.

"The [Department's annual] report did not detail the exact type of information included in the dossiers but indicated a typical file would include a picture, arrest record (if any), and other information, provable or not, from most any source." (Emphasis added.)

Although the cure obviously is not yet complete, it may be that the infection has been localized. And Lamb deserves credit, too, for much of the salutary change in the procedures of the Federal Communications Commission, and in the attitudes of the commissioners and staff. The Lamb Case is the lineal antecedent of the recent favorable ruling by the FCC on the Pacifica Foundation's broadcasting licenses. Pacifica's educational radio stations in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and New York were subjected to a sustained attack by right-wing critics who charged that they had been infiltrated by Communists, and were guilty of broadcasting subversive, obscene, and otherwise controversial matter. Early in 1964, in sustaining Pacifica, the FCC used the occasion for a full-dress policy statement:

"We recognize that as shown by the complaints here such provocative programming as here involved may offend some listeners. But this does not mean that those offended have the right, through the Commission's licensing power, to rule such programming off the airwaves. Were this the case, only the wholly inoffensive, the bland, could gain access to the radio microphone or TV camera. No such drastic curtailment can be countenanced under the Constitution, the Communications Act, or the Commission's policy, which has consistently sought to insure the maintenance of radio and television as a medium of freedom of speech and freedom of expression for the people of the Nation as a whole."*

In this occasional paper, an extensively revised version of a section of his autobiography, No Lamb for Slaughter, Lamb, a director of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, sets forth the story of his melodramatic trial from beginning to end. The title is taken from Edward Livingston's warning to the young American republic that the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 could "establish a code compared to which the ordeal is wise and the trial by battle is merciful and just."

*The text of the Memorandum Opinion and Order in the Pacifica case is published as an appendix to this occasional paper.

"Trial by Battle" by Edward Lamb

On a quiet Saturday afternoon in 1953 an acquaintance walked over from the teletype bank in Washington's National Press Club and handed me a wire service bulletin reporting that the name Edward Lamb had been dropped by a witness testifying before Senator Joseph McCarthy.

The fateful word came from New York, where McCarthy had taken his one-man road show, ostensibly to conduct an inquiry into the affairs of the United Nations.

Without preamble, and wholly out of the context of previous testimony, McCarthy had addressed this question to a witness named John Lautner:

"Do you know Edward Lamb, the broadcaster?"

"I do not know Lamb," Lautner replied, "but I can say he was highly respected by the top Communists. I wouldn't be able to say whether Lamb himself was a card-carrying Communist."

In my turn, I had never even heard of Lautner. Nor would this total stranger, except for this brief passage, have any further connection with my affairs. Yet I soon discovered that John Lautner had great symbolic importance. His presence at Joe McCarthy's "hearing" provided a clear forewarning of the bizarre events that would occupy most of my time for the next four years.

Lautner, I found, was not an eccentric who had found his way to Joe McCarthy. On the contrary, he was a professional witness, one of a sizable pool maintained on the payroll of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Justice. These were admitted ex-Communists retained as "consultants" with the primary duty of testifying at deportation proceedings. They also were made available to other federal agencies and Lautner, the Justice Department's hired talebearer, was on loan to Joe McCarthy for his New York opening.

The tale he bore was pretty thin stuff on its face. He had not in fact accused me of anything, and had admitted that he had no personal knowledge of me or my past. It may be that he didn't even lie under oath; for all I know, at some time in my career as a civil liberties and labor lawyer I may have been "highly respected" by some "top Communists."

But Lautner had done what Joe McCarthy knew very well he would do. The season of national hysteria marked by McCarthy's "hearings" was now well advanced, and Lautner's innocuous statement was enough to link my name to the Communist conspiracy in headlines across the land. A stock of new ammunition had been handed to powerful men in politics and business who were already gunning for Edward Lamb and his enterprises.

If the source of the accusation came to me as a surprise, the direction of the attack did not. By 1953, I had moved on from my Toledo law practice to the operation of a number of prosperous businesses. I was then owner-publisher of the Erie Dispatch-Herald, and had invested heavily in the development of radio and TV properties. I had become a wealthy man, and in the process had acquired the usual set of financially potent business competitors. Moreover, in the course of Adlai Stevenson's 1952 Presidential campaign, I had become prominently identified with the Democratic Party—and 1953 marked the beginning of a new Republican administration.

As far back as 1951, Republican partisans had taken note that a figure of some means and influence had arisen in Ohio and Pennsylvania and was capable of making things uncomfortable for such Old Guard demigods as Senator John Bricker. The Republican leadership of the 81st Congress decided there might be political hay to be harvested from my crusading past. A committee of the House, chaired by Representative Forest Harness but masterminded by Representative Leonard Hall, then Chairman of the Republican National Committee, paraded a long list of witnesses who attacked my character and associations. Despite my repeated requests, I was never allowed to testify in my own defense. But I had my own forum, and on November 4, 1951, I wrote in my signed column in the Dispatch-Herald:

"Congressman Leonard Hall, a pip-squeak congressman from Oyster Bay, recently opened up his money-hungry hands and slapped me. I have always noticed that the smaller the pip, the louder the squeak.

"He had the scoop of all time. He had gone to 'Who's Who in America' and to 'Business Executives of America' in the public libraries and found out all about me. He discovered that in the 1930s, along with other lawyers seeking security for the bar of America, I had helped organize the National Lawyers Guild.

"His vilification of me now qualifies him to become the national chairman of the GOP."

The first of this "documentary evidence," which was to be used against me across the years as a Red smear, had been put together as early as 1945 by a business competitor. That was the year I bought the moribund Erie afternoon paper and began to provide serious and aggressive competition for the dominant Daily Times. John Mead, Jr., the proprietor of the Times, tried to fight back by having put together fourteen full-page articles allegedly reviewing my background. A web of innuendo was woven in an effort to make a Communist conspiracy out of the unpopular underdog cases I had defended as a lawyer for various groups including the American Civil Liberties Union; the court battles I had fought as union counsel in the days of the sit-in strikes; the blows I had dealt to the pocketbooks of many industrialists when I won the key case that established the principle of portal-to-portal pay; and a book called The Planned Economy of Soviet Russia I had written in 1934 after a round-the-world trip.

The series petered out in dullness and proved such a dud the Times did not even publish the last half-dozen installments. But somehow the entire fourteen articles were collected and printed separately, and enjoyed a wide if anonymous mailing to members of Congress and businessmen and financial institutions around the country. This long-discredited material still shows up when I get into a rousing fight on the corporate front—as I did not long ago when I took control of the Seiberling Rubber Company after a protracted stockholders' battle.

In 1953, with Joe McCarthy's star still on the rise and my broadcasting affairs intricately involved in the decisions of a government agency, I had to recognize the Lautner testimony as something more than another skirmish in a partisan political campaign. John C. Doerfer of Wisconsin had been appointed to the Federal Communications Commission by President Eisenhower, and was known to be a protégé and close associate of Senator McCarthy. I had pending before FCC several matters that ordinarily would have been routine —applications for renewal of television licenses, for permission to extend broadcasting range or alter technical equipment, and the like. Commissioner Doerfer now sat in a place where he might determine whether I would receive favorable action on these matters—or, as it turned out, any action at all.

When I ran into the new commissioner at a Washington cocktail party he was pleasantly sociable, but seemed inordinately interested in the financial details of my television affairs. One item of unusual concern was my recent sale of Columbus TV Station WTVN to the family of the late Senator Taft for $2,000,000.

A month after this casual encounter the broadcasting trade papers reported that Commissioner Doerfer was "gunning for the liberal Democrat, Edward Lamb." At the same time the Washington rumor mill ground out the intelligence that McCarthy's Committee on Government Operations was getting ready to move against the broadcasting industry, with Edward Lamb scheduled as the first horrible example. The Lautner testimony in New York was in fact the signal that a two-pronged attack was under way.

On the FCC front my business suddenly came to a dead halt. When my attorneys pressed for action, officials at the operating level said they were now powerless since every proceeding involving Edward Lamb had been flagged to go to the desk of Commissioner Doerfer for "personal processing."

What this could mean is demonstrated by my experience in the Massillon-Canton area of Ohio, where in September 1952 I had received FCC authorization for the construction of a television station. I had bought real estate, optioned broadcasting equipment, hired personnel, and opened an office in Mansfield—in all committing myself to invest some $300,000. Engineering and technical difficulties prevented our completing construction by May 4, 1953, the date stipulated in the original authorization. Doerfer's freeze blocked our routine request for an extension, and by the time this was finally granted—on June 14, 1957, after my public "trial"—an adverse competitive situation had developed so that the great potential value of the license had literally vanished.

My broadcasting interests were then represented by the experienced and able James Lawrence Fly, a former chairman of FCC. Those wise in the ways of Washington advised me that I ought to get rid of my "New Deal lawyer." And some of these further advised me to see a certain legal middleman, or "bagman," in Washington and be ready for a pay-off. I did meet secretly with the gentleman thus designated, heard his proposition, which involved a $60,000 "legal fee," and turned him down. At no time, of course, have I ever said or implied that this lawyer, or any of the other intermediaries who approached me, actually were authorized agents of anyone in FCC or elsewhere in government. The fact that such overtures were made to me—as they often have been made, before and since, to others with difficulties before FCC and other federal agencies—is simply noted here as relevant to the atmosphere in which I had to wage a four-year campaign to clear my good name and protect my properties.

Having decided to press head-on for a showdown, I called in person on the various FCC commissioners and complained about the delay in dealing with my applications. The reaction was unanimous. Under the new regime, I was told, the key to my problems was Commissioner Doerfer.

So, on September 10, 1953, I paid a formal call on Doerfer in his Washington office—still hoping that we might talk over our problems like adult and honorable men.

Face to face, he was pleasant enough, but he promptly launched into a line of questions about my defense of trade unions in the 1930's. He wanted to know all about my book, The Planned Economy of Soviet Russia, and as he pressed these questions he fumbled with documents on his desk with the air of a man who holds a secret dossier.

"Who," he asked, "paid your way to travel in Russia?"

I told him I had paid my own way, and pointed out that I had traveled in a number of other countries on the same trip, a fact that did not seem to interest him.

Doerfer shook his head in disbelief when I admitted helping to organize the National Lawyers Guild. I rather proudly insisted that the Guild was a worthwhile instrument for improving the lot of the American legal profession. At one point in our conversations, he intimated that he couldn't understand why a lawyer of my background would defend colored people, Communists, or labor unions. He gave me the impression that he felt anyone with all my money who was a liberal must be some kind of traitor to capitalism. I told him flatly that if helping my fellow-man made me a liberal, I intended to remain one.

Doerfer listened dubiously as I told him that I had been a Republican, like himself, until Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal seemed to me to offer an appropriate, constitutional way out of many of our economic problems.

"It's too bad," he remarked as we parted, "that you aren't still a Republican."

Later, Doerfer confided to friends of mine that in our meeting I wasn't "contrite enough."

This behind-the-scenes maneuvering was already having a punitive effect on my business affairs, and the innuendo accompanying it began to be felt on the national political scene.

Adlai Stevenson had returned from the extended round-the-world tour with which he followed the 1952 campaign, and Stephen A. Mitchell, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, decided this would provide an occasion for a badly needed display of unity by the party leadership. He asked if Mrs. Lamb and I would sponsor a "welcome-home" buffet dinner in Chicago honoring Stevenson and former President and Mrs. Harry S. Truman. I agreed, and the National Committee sent out a thousand or more invitations to the top party brass.

There was, my friends intimated, a little more to the suggestion that I serve as host than the need to find someone to pay for the dinner. It was to be the occasion when plans would be announced to elect me treasurer of the Democratic National Committee.

As it turned out, my visit to Commissioner Doerfer took place just a few days before the dinner was scheduled. Immediately thereafter, word reached Steve Mitchell that the Republicans had a little surprise waiting that would permanently embarrass Stevenson and Truman. On the night of the welcoming party, Mitchell was told, Republican Chairman Leonard Hall would "expose" host Lamb's "Communist associations."

The threat came straight enough from inner Republican circles for Mitchell to accept it at face value. At an emergency session attended by Charles Murphy, one of Truman's assistants, and J. Lacey Reynolds, my Washington representative, it was decided that the most politically profitable part of valor was discretion. I accepted the judgment, even though it ran counter to my own conviction that no one, politician or not, should bow to such intimidation. Truman and Stevenson, needless to say, had nothing to do with any of this.

New invitations to the party were issued in the name of the Democratic National Committee. My name appeared only on the check for several thousand dollars that paid the bill for food and drink. No one was embarrassed, publicly at least; the Republicans made no hay; and it may be that I escaped becoming the moneybags for the Democratic National Committee—one of the few events in this history which, on second thought, I can recall with any feeling of gratitude.

This inside hatchet-job left no doubt that I was destined for the full smear treatment, and it seemed a reasonable guess that the FCC would be the chosen instrument to deliver it. I sat down with my own conscience and considered again whether I should attempt to head off the personal attack and protect my multi-million-dollar broadcasting affairs by retaining the suggested "Republican law firm." I publicly announced the result of that private deliberation in my Dispatch-Herald column, under the title, "How It Feels to Be the Victim of a Frame-up":

"I have chosen to make a defense, rather than 'make arrangements' in Washington. I do this simply to preserve a good name which I hope to pass on to good children."

Committed to do battle, I retained former U.S. Attorney General J. Howard McGrath, whom I had known for many years, to take over my representation before the FCC. He asked his Providence law partner, Russell Morton Brown, to assist him in handling the details. McGrath knew everyone of any consequence in both political parties, and he had ways of finding out the background of most issues on Capitol Hill.

In March 1954 I received a so-called "McFarland letter," after the FCC had first released its contents to the public. ("McFarland letter" is the general term for a letter that must be sent by all federal administrative agencies to anyone whose rights are challenged, specifying the basis of action to be taken against him.) The FCC's notice stated that I was to face charges that I had misrepresented my qualifications for a television license in affidavits supporting my applications, wherein I had sworn that I had never been a Communist. It went on to say that the FCC had information in its files containing charges "that for a period of years, particularly the period 1944-1948, you were a member of the Communist Party."

Thus I was not only well-smeared, but the FCC had publicly invited my rival applicants for the valuable Toledo television license to use the Communist issue against me. The commission staff certainly knew that their false declaration could be played up in my home town, and that my business competitors and possibly a local political hatchet-man or two could be counted on to help the commission "prove" its charge that I had been a member of the Communist Party. Some of my competitors around the country did actively spread the FCC charge among the businessmen I dealt with—people who bought my products, suppliers of parts and materials to my industries—and in conservative banking circles where I would have to go for credit.

This was not true in all cases, happily. The Toledo Blade, although a competitor for a TV license, pointed out that it was well-informed about me, and that while "anyone would have to get up pretty early in the morning to get the best of Lamb in anything," any charge that I was a Communist was "a lot of bunk."

I answered the McFarland letter, categorically denying all such charges, and requested an early hearing. Thereafter the FCC magnanimously said that I could try to "disprove the charges."

That's quite a trick—proving a negative. But I set out to do it, if it took my last penny.

Early in May 1954, my attorneys went into the United States District Court for the District of Columbia seeking an order to compel the FCC either to renew my licenses or to issue a list of the charges it proposed to assert against me. We also asked the full membership of the commission to give me a hearing so that I could face my accusers, or at least find out what the charges were. The federal court, however, held that the FCC, as an administrative agency, at this preliminary stage of the proceedings could not be compelled to grant these ordinary rights of citizenship.

On May 6, 1954, I ran an advertisement in The New York Times and many other newspapers and magazines throughout the country, offering to pay $10,000 to anyone who could disprove a single one of my many non-Communist affidavits. Of course, there were no takers. The unusual advertisement caused a stir in broadcasting circles, and at least let my enemies know that I was digging in for a fight.

On June 4, 1954, President Eisenhower reappointed Doerfer to a full term on the Federal Communications Commission. Senator Bricker immediately called a meeting of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the U.S. Senate to consider the appointment. I asked for, and received, a chance to appear in opposition to Doerfer's continued presence on the federal agency regulating the broadcasting industry. There, under oath, I recited some of the experiences I had suffered at the hands of Senator McCarthy's lieutenant. Senator Estes Kefauver, also appearing at his own request, was most vehement in pointing out Doerfer's deficiencies. He emphasized that Republicans were in charge of the Senate committee, and warned that Doerfer would prove to be a real embarrassment to President Eisenhower's administration. How correct he was! The Senate approved Mr. Doerfer's appointment on June 28, 1954; six years later Doerfer resigned from the FCC, at the request of President Eisenhower, in the midst of an influence-peddling scandal.

In the meantime, we had put together a considerable staff of lawyers and special investigators, many of them drawn from my own journalistic enterprises, to work with McGrath. We now had reason to fear that the hearings might run on for years—and we had to counter a small army of government agents who were busily working in my own backyard.

The FCC sent men to Toledo, Erie, Columbus, and elsewhere to find "evidence" that I was a Communist. Drew Pearson reported that these men had caused a professional ex-Communist stool pigeon in Toledo, one William Garfield Cummings, to offer another ex-Communist, Emmett L. Wheaton, the sum of $10,000 if he would "remember" that I had attended the opening of a Toledo Communist bookstore, known as Lincoln House, in 1944.

FCC investigators went to a former secretary in my office, Evelyn Runge, who had moved to Elyria, Ohio, after leaving my employ. They asked her if she could give them any information about any possible income tax or "girl friend" problems.

"Lamb had good accountants prepare his financial returns, and his accounts were approved after especially thorough examination by the government," she told them. "And what does his sex life have to do with the charge of communism?"

She did give the FCC investigators four half-truths they tied together for later use. Fortunately, we learned about her "revelations" before she took the witness stand, and were able to explain away many of her fantasies.

These are only two of many such instances we uncovered by mounting our own diligent, widespread, and expensive counter-investigation. The FCC had asserted that it had proof that I had been a Communist—but now, after the fact, the agency was employing apparently unlimited government funds and manpower to seek any sort of "evidence" to back up the verdict already publicly rendered.

Day after day the FCC kept the headlines hot with publicity releases referring to new secret "evidence" against me. But the agency continued to reject repeated demands of my counsel for a bill of particulars—and it held to this position even after the Senate

Interstate Commerce Committee formally directed the agency to provide me with details of the charges against me and the names of my accusers.

Finally, after long delays, we went into open court to face an unsubstantiated charge of what amounted to treason brought against me by an agency of my own government—and we had to go to trial on the agency's own terms.

The hearing opened on September 5, 1954, in the ornate auditorium of the Interstate Commerce Building. In those days, when someone hollered "Communist," he automatically had a circus, and the television crews and reporters were there in force.

The one encouraging sign was the presence of the Trial Examiner appointed by FCC to preside over the hearings. The assignment had fallen to Herbert Sharfman, a veteran of more than twenty years of government service. He had a reputation as a fair-minded and scholarly official, and able to make use of the independence guaranteed by his civil-service status.

Sharfman had to operate, however, within a set of procedures that ran contrary to every ordinary legal practice I had been accustomed to in my years in the courtroom. The chief prosecutor for FCC, Walter F. (Bucky) Powell, Jr., was free to introduce any charge against me he saw fit—with the burden of disproving the allegation falling upon the defendant.

To me, as a lawyer, perhaps the most shocking procedural aspect of the case was the ability of the prosecution to shift the ground of the "indictment" drastically in the course of the trial. The specific charge set forth in the McFarland letter was "that for a period of years, particularly the period 1944-1948, you were a member of the Communist Party." This we were fully prepared to refute. By the time we got to court the FCC lawyers knew as well as I did that the charge was wholly false and would never stand. But under FCC procedures they were now allowed to take out a new hunting license, and this one virtually without limits. The charge we now faced was that a dozen or more years ago I had "associated" with Communists.

Our inability to force any advance disclosure of Prosecutor Powell's list of witnesses gave him an opportunity to time their appearance for maximum publicity effect. To assist in this effort, the press agents of the FCC issued daily releases—these dealing in a highly prejudicial way with a trial the agency itself was conducting! Day after day a colorful and highly damaging piece of testimony coincided with the deadline for afternoon papers; day after day our cross-examination exploded the allegation and discredited the witness—but almost always the truth lagged the lie by a full day in the publication cycle.

And what a parade of witnesses Powell produced —perjurers, bigamists, homosexuals, and even a convicted murderer were brought on to testify against me, and most of them were paid to do so with my own government's money.

The first of the FCC witnesses was William Garfield Cummings, a Toledo informer who set the style and the tone of the entire prosecution.

Cummings asserted that he had been a member of the Communist Party during the 1940's and that he had seen me at the opening of the Lincoln House, a bookstore in Toledo, standing among a group of Communists. He testified for three days about my "contributions" to the Communist Party.

I was certain that I had never seen him before, and I knew that his specific statements were false. But, since we had discovered that he was likely to testify, we had found out plenty about Cummings. Our cross-examination began to bring out the character of this key government witness.

One of his claims to distinction was that he had recruited several people among his own family and his "best friends" for the Communist Party and then reported them to the Federal Bureau of Investigation! It also came out that, in taking out a second marriage license at Bowling Green, Ohio, he had denied under oath that he had been married before. Cummings, who had five children by his second and possibly bigamous marriage, was arrested for perjury during my trial.

Our cross-examination also brought out the reason that a man of Cummings' dubious background was willing to expose himself in court. He testified that his sole current income was the $25 a day he received from FCC to testify against me. He was one of the Immigration Service's professionals.

Perhaps the most trivial testimony was provided by Carl Wideman, a bespectacled real estate man from Columbus, Ohio. This witness swore that at Marion, Ohio, in the early 1930's, when he was seventeen, he had attended an after-lecture coffee session at which I talked for two hours about the Soviet economy. He swore he could remember every word I said—although he could not remember a single other person who had been in the room.

Wideman's great value to us was that under cross-examination he admitted what we believed to be the case with all these witnesses—that his questions and answers had been prepared for him by the investigative staff of the FCC.

After him came short, yellow-haired Louis Budenz, who in those days spent most of his time testifying for pay for the United States government. As a veteran of innumerable Communist "exposure" trials, he knew how to arrange the wildest story to make fodder for headlines. Innuendo, guilt by association, "identification"—at this he was the master. Budenz was America's number-one professional witness, and I am proud that this FCC hearing probably ended his profitable career as a government-sponsored character assassin.

Budenz could in fact claim to know me, for he had once been my client in a civil liberties case during the bitter Electric Auto Lite strike at Toledo. But the "evidence" against me did not come from this brief association, but was drawn from his standard resource as a professional witness. It was Budenz's claim that the names of 400 secret Communists, given him by a high party official named Jack Stachel, were permanently etched in his mind. He had memorized the list, he said, before he and Stachel tore it up. For the purposes of this "trial" Budenz cheerfully placed me on his secret list. Why not? As a government witness he had total immunity from libel action, and in 1953 he claimed he had earned $70,000 in the witness chair.

Budenz admitted under cross-examination that he had written several books and articles and delivered hundreds of speeches without once having mentioned my name as an associate or friend of Communists. He had no explanation for this oversight. We were able to suggest that it might be because no one had previously hired him to do so.

Another prosecution witness was Ernest Courey, a man who sanctimoniously described himself as a "respected summer-resort operator" in Mercer, Wisconsin. He related how he had once joined the Communist Party as an undercover operative for a private detective agency. He said the Communists trusted him to collect dues and sell tickets for their various affairs.

In 1938, he said, he went to my Toledo law office and received $2 as a contribution for a Communist picnic. Later, he said, I gave a donation to hire a hall where Earl Browder planned to speak.

Under cross-examination, this "respected" operator at first denied he had a criminal record. But our investigation had disclosed that he was a convicted murderer who had shot to death one Joseph Benjamin in Cleveland in 1925. He could recall selling me a $2 ticket to a picnic a dozen years before, but it was left for us to find out and recall that he had served a penitentiary sentence for murder.

"I shouldn't have served an hour," he protested.

"Well, did you obtain a liquor license to operate your tavern in Wisconsin?" my attorney asked.

"Yes."

"Did you represent to the Wisconsin State Liquor Authority that you had never been convicted of a crime?"

"Nobody asked me that question," Courey growled.

At this point we produced a certified copy of the application in which Courey stated, in his own handwriting, that he had never been convicted of a crime at any time or place.

It was Courey who provided us with the opportunity to show that the Immigration and Naturalization Service had more than money to assist in producing these professional witnesses. Courey was a Syrian facing deportation. He had reason to assume that he was expected to tell the "right" story, or back to Syria he would go. A cornered lawbreaker is not difficult to suborn.

The most spectacular witness in the whole charade, and the one whose rise and fall marked the turning point in our defense, was a quiet-spoken, squat woman with thick glasses and short-cropped gray hair. She gave her name as Marie Natvig and her address as Miami,

Florida. Astonishingly enough, she was cast as a femme fatale.

Elaborately, she spelled out her background: member of a socially prominent Cleveland family of substantial wealth, she had been educated at Eastern schools and had taught in the public schools in Cleveland.

She had first met me, she said, at a Communist meeting of agricultural workers in Chicago in 1936. She said that she had been a member of the Communist Party from 1925 to 1937, lured into the movement by the Depression, which cost her the penthouse, Rolls-Royce, and three servants she had enjoyed in the booming 1920's.

This imaginative woman claimed that she had again seen me at a Communist Party conference in Columbus early in 1936. She recalled that while I was addressing the meeting, I had pulled out of my pocket a "sketch" of my plans for setting up the National Lawyers Guild "as the legal arm of the Communist Party." She told how "Comrade Lamb" had led discussions of intricate problems of dialectical materialism, and said I had outlined practical ways to lure non-Communist lawyers into the National Lawyers Guild. She recalled that I had described the course of events to come in Asia, including the cold and hot wars raging through the 1930's.

"Didn't those terms come into existence years later?" Examiner Sharfman asked.

"No, Comrade Lamb invented them," she replied.

Mrs. Natvig built up steam when she said that I had been in favor of a modern American revolution —that I had proposed first to seize communications, then transportation, and finally prepare for insurrection in the armed forces, because "only through revolution could the intolerable living conditions of the oppressed masses be alleviated."

The mild little lady had already produced a first-class newspaper sensation, but on the second day of her testimony she found a way to make the headline type grow even larger. Testifying about the meetings I had supposedly attended in Columbus, she shyly confided that "Mr. Lamb and I had a 'liaison' in the Chittenden Hotel." Then, with bowed head, she added movingly that this was "my first infidelity and led to my divorce."

It would have seemed that a revolutionary conspiracy plus a sex scandal would have been enough to satisfy the most avid member of the FCC's staff, but Mrs. Natvig was encouraged to bring her exotic adventures up to date. Now she testified that right there in Washington, only the night before, a romantic encounter in a night club had produced the offer of a bribe of $50,000 if she would agree not to testify further against me. This sum, which she had indignantly spurned, had been proffered by a railroad-yard worker named Millings Underwood. Now the prosecution had a spy melodrama, soap opera, and detective story all wrapped up in one package.

Incredible as it now seems, this maundering tale was allowed to run into many thousands of words of testimony; with our cross-examination and her subsequent return appearances Mrs. Natvig's time on the witness stand actually ran into weeks. This at least gave us time to launch our own investigation. And here we had to start from scratch, for, as I listened in awe to these intimate details of my biography, I knew I had never seen Mrs. Natvig before, at any time, at any place, under any circumstances.

Our detectives found the first clue in the criminal records. We found that the sheltered flower had been arrested for soliciting in Madison, Wisconsin, as early as 1928, and had faced embezzlement charges in Florida. Members of her family revealed that her "socialite father" had in fact been an honest, hard-working second-hand furniture dealer in Cleveland, who had long since severed all connection with his wayward daughter. We were told that she had been married at least three times, and each of her husbands had gone bankrupt. We found a sad explanation for her violent reaction to questions regarding her children; she had been denied their custody years before and they had grown up to lead decent, respectable lives. But this delicacy did not apply to the Lamb children, who heard Mrs. Natvig accuse their father of a wide variety of immorality, scarlet and otherwise. "Let Comrade Lamb start paying for his sins!" she declaimed happily to the reporters—and we had no option but to parade her own varied history for the record in such overwhelming detail that she was later convicted of perjury.

Her testimony against me was so outlandish that we tended at first to dismiss the tale of Millings Underwood and his bribe as another cut from the whole cloth. But in the course of a routine check one of our detectives discovered that there was indeed such a person, and he delivered a highly embarrassed Virginia railroadman to the hearing room.

The hapless Underwood, with his wife sitting in the packed courtroom, said that he had been "out on the town" on the night of September 24, and had picked up a lone woman sitting at one end of a hotel bar. They went down the street and had a "few beers" together at the Lotus Restaurant. They were getting a little high, when the lady excused herself to make a telephone call.

It developed that Mrs. Natvig had called Walter Leahy of the FCC staff, who was "assigned to sleuthing Lamb," and told him a man had offered her a $50,000 bribe not to testify against me. After the telephone call she insisted that Underwood take her back to her own hotel. The unsuspecting and unrequited Underwood left her at the front door—in full view of two waiting FCC witnesses.

The morning after Mrs. Natvig's story of the proffered bribe, the bewildered Underwood saw his name in newspaper stories tacked on the railroad-roundhouse bulletin board. He was kidded by his fellow-workers. But the stories didn't seem a bit funny to Mrs. Underwood.

When our attorneys called at his Arlington home about eleven o'clock the night after Mrs. Natvig's testimony, he broke down and frankly told the story from the beginning. He was quite forthright about how he had intended to entertain the lady that night. But, he said, all he did was eat chow mein and have "a few" more drinks. He was emphatic that my name wasn't even mentioned at the Lotus Restaurant.

"The only Lamb I've ever heard about is the Art Lamb I look at on television at home with my wife," he said.

The Natvig debacle put the FCC clearly on the defensive. In checking on her past we found the FBI willing to assist in such matters as establishing that she had signed non-Communist oaths in applying for federal jobs—and probably had not in fact ever been a party member. It was clear that the FBI was no longer supporting the FCC prosecutors. And it was difficult to see how anyone could. As the more than 800 printed pages of Mrs. Natvig's transcript went over to the United States attorney as the basis for perjury action, Howard McGrath pointed out that there was at least one patent and glaring contradiction on every page. The Trial Examiner finally abandoned the effort to extract any sense from her, and excused her with the stipulation that she remain under subpoena for possible recall.

This was the point where the sympathy of much of the nation's press began to swing to my side—and outspoken commentators like Drew Pearson, Robert S. Allen, Doris Fleeson, Peter Edson, and Joseph C. Harsch began to ask what the devil the government lawyers were up to in the Lamb case. In time the radio and television industry also began to lend me some support—but by and large the record of the timid broadcasters was one of extreme prudence, even though I was surely fighting their battle for freedom of the air against an overbearing bureaucracy.

The changing atmosphere had a practical effect on our conduct of the trial. Now honest men and women in government began to feed us advance information about the prosecution's "surprise" witnesses, and we were able to launch our counterattack quickly. Soon we were in position to do our own "leaking" to the reporters. On one memorable occasion we actually obtained recordings of the FCC lawyers' coaching session with a witness, and when he began to recite his well-rehearsed lines members of the audience chanted his answers before he could gulp them out.

Even though the prosecutors continued on their collision course they had lost important support in high places—even among the FCC commissioners themselves. It was widely believed in Washington, and with reason, that for many purposes Joe McCarthy could control the commission. In addition to Doerfer, he had persuaded President Eisenhower to give a seat to Robert E. Lee, who had been a clerk for McCarthy's "un-American Committee," had been employed in the extreme right-wing propaganda enterprises of Texas oil millionaire H. L. Hunt, and was best man in McCarthy's wedding. Yet, as we were to discover later, even Joe McCarthy was getting a bellyful of the blundering ineptness of the FCC legal staff.

In 1955, in his office in the Senate Office Building, McCarthy told J. Howard McGrath, "I won't have anything more to do with investigating Ted Lamb. Let those bastards in FCC wash their own linen!"

And as a manifest of his good faith he turned over to McGrath all the information he had about me in his files, including possibly confidential material obtained from government sources. This was, of course, an invaluable aid in permitting us to diagnose the opposition's strategy.

Still, the FCC attorneys showed no disposition to back away from the case. And, on our side, I was equally determined to have our full day in court. It was now clear that we had the means of laying bare the whole, despicable machinery so widely used in Washington for hiring, intimidating, and suborning witnesses in the era of the Red witch-hunt.

We found early in this protracted ordeal that the FCC attorneys were deliberately engaging in an endless juggling of hearing schedules to affect the timing of testimony. One result was to put our witnesses to the inconvenience of standing by in Washington, sometimes for weeks, waiting to testify. We, of course, had to bear the expense of maintaining them.

Now we discovered that the same technique was being used with reverse English against the FCC's own witnesses. Those who balked at going along with some of the demands made upon them found their maintenance funds and promised fees withheld—and were forced to pay their own way, leave town, or testify exactly as the prosecution demanded. Under our pressure the practice began to rebound, and the witnesses began to collapse in the face of stringent cross-examination.

Lowell Watson, a dairy farmer from Olathe, Kansas, took the stand to testify that he had visited my office in 1931 along with the Ohio Communist leader, Eugene Stoll, and had received from me "numerous" contributions "for the Communist Party or its legal arm, the International Labor Defense."

When our attorneys bore down, Watson admitted that during the noon recess he had been instructed by the FCC attorneys to swear falsely that he was not being compensated by the government but was testifying against me purely as a "patriotic gesture."

Shaken by being caught in that lie, and perhaps also by the realization that he was confronted by a former Attorney General of the United States in the person of Howard McGrath, Watson returned to the stand next day to counter the whole of his testimony.

He began by revealing that he had talked to Eugene Stoll in Washington the previous night, and Stoll had told him he would not go along with the FCC's "plot." Stoll said that he had never heard of me until the year 1934, some three years after Watson had testified that he and Stoll had visited my Toledo law office. He told Watson that he had better "come clean" and tell the truth about the details of his employment by the government.

Now Watson testified that the word "Communist" had never been mentioned in my law office. He pleaded that he was merely a disillusioned witness, but admitted that he had been hired by the Immigration and Naturalization Service for "good money." He confessed that the FCC attorneys had given him a prepared script when he arrived in Washington, and had ordered him to memorize it down to the last detail.

Nelson Meagley, an owlish former Socialist and anti-Communist, of Toledo, said he "thought" that I had contributed "some amount" in 1934 or 1935 to the defense of Ben Grey, the head of an A. F. of L. affiliate in Columbus, Ohio. My attorney wanted to know why any American lawyer should be castigated for aiding in the defense of a fellow-citizen in trouble. Prosecutor Powell replied that if it turned out later that Grey had been a Communist, then I would have sworn falsely that I had not contributed to Communists!

Whatever the FCC lawyers had in mind for their nineteenth witness, it did not materialize. He was Edward T. Cheyfitz, a red-headed, smooth-talking Toledo and Washington lawyer who described himself as a witness "more reluctant than the reluctant dragon." He had reason to be. He had been an active and well-known Communist from 1932 to 1939, and also had been a sort of personal protégé of mine, one of many bright young men I had helped get established.

Cheyfitz, so far as the prosecution was concerned, went off the reservation from the outset. He testified that so far as he knew I not only had never been a Communist or a contributor to Communist causes, but that in fact I had persuaded him to leave the party and concentrate his considerable talents in organizing for the trade union movement. (He had by this time moved on from his union career to practice on the side of management, and he later became an associate of the distinguished civil liberties lawyer Edward Bennett Williams—who, in a later epoch, would wind up defending an underdog named Joseph McCarthy.)

Cheyfitz told in colorful detail how, when he broke with the party in 1940, I had supported him in a fight against the Communist faction in the Die Casters Union, which I served as general counsel. He conceded that I had been instrumental in getting him elected president of the union on an anti-Communist ticket.

Perhaps the most damaging statement he made was that he had seen Earl Browder, the head of the Communist Party, in my law office. The interesting sequel to that revelation was that it was Cheyfitz who had brought him there, and that the result of the conference was that I had refused to accept a libel suit Browder wanted to bring against the Toledo Blade on the ground that it had no merit.

The FCC had called Cheyfitz, but by the time he was through the infuriated prosecutor, Powell, demanded that the Trial Examiner declare him "a witness hostile to the government."

It was obvious that Powell didn't want to make that mistake again, and so it was only after powerful argument on our part that the Trial Examiner forced him to bring to the stand another key figure the government had brought to Washington—Eugene Stoll.

Stoll, who had been mentioned by other witnesses, clearly was in position to know the truth about many of the charges of Communist activity that had been hurled against me. He was the long-time leader of the Communist Party in Toledo and the Middle West.

It was established by now that Stoll had refused to take any FCC money (except for his actual expenses on the trip to Washington) and in absentia he had already blown up the testimony of Lowell Watson. He had been kept on ice in Washington for more than a month, and the FCC lawyers had made an effort to soften him up by withholding the nine dollars a day he was allowed for food.

He turned out to be the most credible FCC witness in the entire case, and the most damaging to the prosecution.

The gaunt, ascetic Stoll lived in a miserable shack on a sand patch at Swanton, Ohio, a small town outside Toledo. He had been secretary of the Communist Party in Lucas County and had suffered extreme poverty from the very first day he became a radical. He proudly admitted that he had been active in left-wing labor union matters. He said that the only times he saw me were on occasions when I was defending labor unions in courtrooms. Calmly, he told the Trial Examiner that he had visited me in Toledo in June of 1954, after he himself had been thrown out of the Communist Party. He had asked me "just one question."

Alone in my private office in the Edward Lamb Building, he had said, "I ask you man to man, eye to eye, and face to face—do you have any connection with the Communist movement?"

And Stoll quoted me as saying in reply, "Gene, as God is my witness, man to man, eye to eye, and face to face, I have no connection and never have had any connection with the Communist Party anywhere, any place."

"I am absolutely certain that Lamb told the truth," Stoll testified.

Stoll proceeded to explode the testimony of every earlier government witness. His presentation was direct and precise, and it was devastating. He denied that he had ever solicited or received any funds from me, or that there was a "must list" of contributors to the Communist Party, as William Cummings had testified.

Mrs. Natvig had testified that she and her fellow-Communists in their frequent meetings were wont to "eat caviar and drink gin." Stoll, the real Communist, grimaced as he said bluntly that he had never even seen—much less tasted—caviar.

Mrs. Natvig had said that she had seen me in "state Communist meetings in Columbus, Ohio." Stoll—who knew—insisted that the party held its meetings always in Cleveland, never in Columbus.

Mrs. Natvig had testified that she and I had romantically "held hands in the low light of the cocktail bar known as the Purple Cow in Columbus." Stoll pointed out that the Purple Cow was a brightly-lit coffee shop and didn't sell liquor.

Stoll was followed by a witness billed by an FCC press release as "another woman to testify against Lamb." The FCC lawyers called her to the stand under the name of Mabel Flicker, the "former wife of a Communist by the name of Kenneth Ostheimer."

Actually, she was now the wife of Gene Stoll—and the effect of her testimony was to corroborate her husband's account of the efforts of the Immigration and Naturalization Service to put them on the government payroll as "consultants" if they would "go along" in prosecuting "the case against Lamb."

"Could this be the American government doing this?" Gene Stoll asked. "Anyway, I'll never be so hungry that I can stoop to taking that kind of blood money."

Now the long hearing passed over to 1955. Walter Powell, the FCC prosecutor, suffered a heart attack and nervous exhaustion, and suddenly resigned. In February we went back to court to face his replacement, Joseph Kittner, an abler lawyer but one apparently no less determined to give credence to anyone who offered hope that he might sustain the indictment he had inherited.

But this was to be the season of recantation. And the first of those to hit the sawdust trail was none other than Marie Natvig. She sent word to our counsel that she wanted to set the record straight—and now it was the turn of the FCC lawyers to listen with open mouths as she primly offered her revelations from the witness stand.

"Just tell the truth," Howard McGrath instructed her, and stood aside while the lady began with the statement that all the charges she had made against me were completely false. Comrade Lamb had been replaced by Prosecutor Powell as the villain in the piece.

She testified that she had been coerced by the FCC lawyers, that she had lied about having sexual relations with me, that she had never been a member of the Communist Party. She emphasized again and again that she had been induced by Powell to relate the story of having seen me with "maps" of the "forthcoming revolution in Asia and Europe." All of her original testimony had been a fabrication bought and paid for by the prosecution.

Powell, she testified, at one point had told her: "Okay, kid, let's murder this bum, Lamb."

"The FCC lawyers told me it was my duty to testify, because Lamb's radio station could beam atom bombs from foreign countries and also beam in enemy broadcasts," Mrs. Natvig said. "They told me to repeat over and over that Lamb had close connections with the Communist Party."

Powell, she claimed, had also dreamed up the romance between us. "Make it gory," she quoted him as telling her. "It's good for big headlines."

Mrs. Natvig admitted that she had never known me in Chicago or Columbus or anywhere else. She testified that the bribe-hoax involving the railroad worker Millings Underwood had been plotted by the FCC lawyers after she had met Underwood the night of their "date," even though she and Underwood had never had any discussion of money.

Fear of criminal action by us probably was the prime motivation for this turnabout, particularly with Powell no longer on hand as a protector, but she insisted piously that she felt compelled to "right the grievous wrongs which I did to Mr. Lamb."

Kittner then made a remarkable error for an experienced courtroom lawyer. In a futile effort to repair the damage, he gave this marathon witness another inning by undertaking cross-examination.

Mrs. Natvig's answers made the whole FCC squirm. Now in quiet, subdued clothes, lace collar and all, she insisted that by her retraction she was making peace with man and God. She felt now that she was righting a horrible wrong against me and my family. She insisted that "only an idiot" could have believed her earlier testimony. She said that when she told the FCC lawyers she wanted to repudiate her falsehoods against me, they first offered her new inducements and, when she refused, threatened her with arrest for perjury.

Mrs. Natvig told of her enforced confinement in Washington hotel rooms, with FCC lawyers sitting outside to prevent access to her by "outsiders." She charged that these lawyers often had "browbeaten" and "brainwashed" her, forcing her to go along with the prepared script. She offered harrowing tales of skull sessions with the FCC lawyers and said, "We were manufacturing evidence which I was forced to memorize."

At the end the Trial Examiner observed, perhaps with irony, that Mrs. Natvig appeared to be exercising moral courage in recanting her previous testimony. McGrath, without irony but with obvious relief, said repeatedly in open court that he would not at any time attempt to vouch for the lady's credibility, but only hoped that we had finally arrived somewhere in the vicinity of the truth.

Behind Mrs. Natvig came Clark Wideman, the Columbus real estate man. He had falsely uttered words put in his mouth by the FCC lawyers, he said.

Lowell Watson, the Kansas dairy farmer, said grimly that throughout the year-end recess he had battled with his conscience after having publicly lied for pay.

"My previous testimony was false," he said. "It was the result of constant and consistent coaching by legal representatives of the FCC."

And this somber man added a note of low comedy that might well summarize the season of recantation. On the opening day of his testimony his first duty was to identify me, and he had been shown many photographs and had been told exactly where I would be sitting in the hearing room. As additional insurance, two FCC lawyers had been stationed directly behind me and made high signs so that the finger of accusation would be certain to find the proper target.

Then Watson added thoughtfully, "Before I was briefed, however, in my own mind I had already picked out the person in the hearing room I thought was Mr. Lamb."

"Who was it?"

"Mr. McGrath."

We had finally broken through the diversionary effect of sensational testimony and made the point that I was clearly being victimized by perjurers hired for the purpose—and that the government's lawyers were parties to a conspiracy to manufacture evidence against me. The Christian Science Monitor, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Washington Post, and dozens of other influential newspapers began to cite the Lamb case as an example of justice perverted. The phrase "professional witness" came into the public vocabulary.

There were stirrings on Capitol Hill, too. Estes Kefauver, Mike Monroney of Oklahoma, Henry Jackson of Washington, John Pastore of Rhode Island, and Albert Gore of Tennessee began to speak up on the Democratic side of the Senate, and were joined across the aisle by Republicans James Duff of Pennsylvania and Margaret Chase Smith of Maine. Thomas Ludlow Ashley, Congressman from my own district in Toledo, who was in a position to know my record, ripped into the FCC for staging what he called a witch-hunt and a political frame-up.

This came directly home to the FCC when Senator Warren G. Magnuson of Washington, chairman of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, invited me to appear at a public hearing and said: "I propose to make it my business to see to it that Edward Lamb at long last gets fair and equitable treatment in view of all the abuse to which he has been subjected. We will want a careful look at what happened in his case before the Federal Communications Commission. Our committee has supervision over FCC and we will want a lot of explanation about the goings-on in the Lamb case."

Magnuson went on to say that the committee would take a close look at the whole of FCC's operations to see "what it takes to get or keep a TV license." That was the moment when an unhappy new Eisenhower appointee, Ohio Republican George C. McConnaughey, came before the committee to be confirmed as new chairman of FCC.

McConnaughey backed and filled and pleaded innocent to any knowledge of the Lamb case, but the questioning was so pointed that his old friend and supporter, Senator Bricker, frequently had to ride to his rescue. Then Senator Kefauver took over with a series of incisive questions that culminated in this:

"When a matter like this, a matter of outright coercion of witnesses, comes up, Mr. McConnaughey, the entire Committee and the public has a feeling of revulsion. As chief administrator of the FCC, haven't you looked into this just a little bit?"

"I planned to," McConnaughey said. "As a result of the Lamb case, I want to look into the general principles of license renewals."

Against this background we might have been able to bring the long inquisition to a halt. My attorney, Howard McGrath, announced that we would file proceedings to have the whole case tossed out by the FCC. Prosecutor Kittner demurred – and we promptly switched our motion for dismissal to a demand for a complete hearing, which would give me a chance to take the stand and have at my adversaries under oath.

McGrath's associate, Russell Brown, argued that we should press for dismissal, and he was certain the now acutely embarrassed FCC would grant it. I said no, that I had paid dearly for my day in court and I intended to enjoy it—and maybe serve the public interest in the process.

I finally took my place in the witness chair on April 1, 1955. More than twenty-five reporters and a half-dozen photographers were on hand as the Trial Examiner called the courtroom to order for my presentation. Noticeably absent from the hearing room were the commissioners of the FCC, although their administrative assistants kept slipping in and out, carefully recording in their notebooks the details of the proceedings. One reporter observed that "history would record Lamb had the guts to face his accusers, but no one could ever claim that the FCC members had the guts to face their own hired professional witnesses."

All the members of my family were in that Washington hearing room. I was especially anxious to have them hear my testimony, given under oath.

In my opening statement to the FCC I told of my early days as a workingman's lawyer—days of depression and social upheaval, bitter strikes, hungry men, and economic disorder. I described the lunatic fringe groups that crowded into our struggles, the phony philosophers and political quacks who came not to advance the welfare of the workers or to settle strikes, but merely to obtain for themselves personal publicity and personal advancement.

A union, I pointed out, seldom chooses its own members. Thus, while I represented many unions, it was not up to me to inquire into the political, social, religious, or economic attachments of those who belonged to unions. I merely had defended strikers who were seeking their legal rights. Of course, I sought improved working conditions for them, and that meant the better life.

"I defended dozens of labor cases at the request of the American Civil Liberties Union and others," I said. "I may even have taken cases for members of the International Labor Defense, a perfectly legal organization at that time." And in connection with the American Civil Liberties Union, I testified that I had been a member since its earliest days, and "I am proud to be a member now; and I shall continue to be a member.

"Most of all, I don't want anyone to get the notion that I appear here on this public stand to withdraw from my past associations or activities on behalf of the underprivileged," I added. "I have always fought for the things that I considered to be in the highest tradition of American democratic liberties."

Then, pointing at the FCC staff, I said, "My government, not I alone, is on trial here.

"I am waiving my obvious objections to the propriety of this inquiry into my opinions, so that you people, who have put on your professional witnesses, may ask me any question you want about my past activities. But don't for one second get the idea that I am here to apologize for my life, any part of my life, or any of my social, political, or economic activities."

In 1947 Attorney General Tom C. Clark had published a list of organizations that he had decided were "subversive." This list contained the names of many organizations I had defended—such as the International Labor Defense, the American Committee for the Protection of the Foreign Born, the American League Against War and Fascism, and others. During the 1930's my name appeared on the letterheads of some of these organizations. Now, twenty years later, I had no particular recollection of ever having authorized such use of my name, since at the time I would not have considered it important.

Prosecutor Kittner repeatedly charged me with membership in the International Labor Defense. Two professional witnesses had already attempted to link me with that organization, but one, Lowell Watson, had retracted his statement and said that he had been coached into giving false testimony by Powell and other FCC attorneys.

"I first heard that I was a member of the National Committee of the International Labor Defense from your own professional witness, Louis Budenz," I told Kittner. "But I have heard more about it since you people have tried to hang these disgraceful Communist charges on me than I ever did before. You were the ones who hired the liars to repeat your manufactured slanders, and now we have the spectacle of your same people in the FCC passing judgment on the truth or falsity of your own manufactured evidence.

"I assure you that I am not unhappy that it has fallen to me to defend the American freedoms which are at stake in this hearing," I said. "I have defended many minority groups, many trade unions, and many unpopular causes. I suppose any person is a 'controversial' figure who defends the rights of the unorthodox. But by defending this case, I am fighting the hysteria of this sad era while, at the same time, I am defending my own good name.

"As a result of this proceeding, I feel certain that such a violation of American liberties will not be attempted again. I have only one hope. This is that I may go down in history as a man of sufficient courage to have thwarted such encroachments on our freedoms as are represented in this attempted frame-up. I am shocked that my own government should have been used in such a dastardly fashion."

I had waited a long time for this moment, and I gave them both barrels. I said that I was prepared to stay on the witness stand as long as any person in the world had any conceivable question to ask of me, and that I was perfectly conscious of their attempt to entrap me into statements that might appear inconsistent with the millions of words of prior testimony as grounds for a possible perjury trial.

"For it is clear to everyone," I said, "that certain people high in the government, including at least one member of the Federal Communications Commission, are seeking by any means whatsoever to bring the strength of the government itself down upon my head."

Kittner and his associates met that challenge with what must be one of the most protracted cross-examinations in history. For almost three weeks we traversed the old ground as if, anticipating my clearance by the Trial Examiner, the prosecutor was trying to perfect a record for appeal to the FCC. All the infamous tricks of the McCarthy era were brought into play; at one point Kittner produced dozens of obscure left-wing publications and, even though he could not connect me with them in any way, argued that they represented the opinions of men I had somehow "been associated with."

The assault on my 1934 book, The Planned Economy of Soviet Russia, gave me an opportunity to place into the record a summary of the view I have held since I first began to study economics at Dartmouth, the view I have preached to the industrial leaders of the country and put into practice in dozens of my own successful business ventures:

"I have been a student of the economy of the United States. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that any organization or society can run without planning. In those early depression days, Americans saw the 'paradox of plenty,' when warehouses bulged with stored food even as men starved. While we have not resolved matters of equitable distribution of our resources or the paradox of farm surpluses, our country at least inaugurated during those early days many intelligent and far-reaching supports for our economy. As it is with large corporations and even with nations, so it is with smaller units such as states and communities. All of them require sensible surveying and planning."

As the hearing dragged toward a close in May 1955, I experienced one of the few moments of pleasure I had known since the FCC declared war on me in 1953. Old friends, on their own motion and without subpoena, began to come forward to testify as witnesses to my loyalty and character.

Estes Kefauver led the parade; then came Lowell Baldwin, a prominent Republican businessman of Maumee, Ohio, who is my oldest law client; Sam Sponseller of Cleveland, a regional director of the CIO who had known me in the 1930's when I took my first labor cases; David L. Lawrence, then mayor of Pittsburgh and later governor of Pennsylvania, who had known me as a labor lawyer since 1935 and testified that he was so confident of my integrity that he had once, on behalf of Philip Murray, tried to persuade me to move to Pittsburgh and become general counsel of the CIO.

And finally there was August Scholle of Detroit, as staunch an anti-Communist as any in the trade union movement. Gus Scholle told of our close association for more than two decades, and recounted the battles we had fought—some of them to head off Communist efforts to infiltrate the union movement.

The Trial Examiner asked Scholle if he had ever heard me express any anti-Communist sentiments.

"Of course I did—on a thousand occasions," replied Scholle.

"Did you ever ask Lamb if he ever belonged to any Communist-front organizations?"

"I never went to Ted Lamb and said, 'Ted, are you sympathetic to Communists?' It would be like asking the people in this room, 'Are you a bunch of traitors?' It would be stupid."

The day in court was over, but the legal in-fighting wasn't. There were delays, motions, counter-motions — and in my judgment at least one more double-cross by the prosecution, in violation of an agreement between counsel to expedite the submission of final arguments to the Trial Examiner. At one point Kittner suddenly tossed in a new document of 350 pages consisting of lengthy, violent attacks on me—and of course released this privileged matter to the press. But there were repercussions from above, and Kittner and Curtis Plummer, another member of the prosecution staff, were suddenly relieved and transferred to other posts within FCC. They had joined what finally would be a considerable list of fall guys.

In September, Trial Examiner Sharfman fell victim to the terrible strain of this fantastic hearing, and went into Georgetown Hospital with a severe heart attack. He recovered, however, and finally, on December 1, 1955, he completed his 25,000-word decision and sent it to the printers.

Every one of the issues submitted to the Examiner for finding of fact was decided in our favor. The opinion held that "Mr. Lamb possesses the qualifications necessary for a broadcast station licensee," and that the requested TV grant "would be in the public's interest, convenience, and necessity."

TV Digest, the leading trade publication, commented:

"Sharfman's 140-page decision, noteworthy for its literary embellishments, its curious analyses of grammar, its capsule book reviews and its sparklings of witticisms and sarcasms, concluded that: 'There is no proof that Lamb personally engaged in any subversive activity.' The picture of Lamb is that of a shrewd, successful and aggressive lawyer. The 'initial decision' of the Trial Examiner gives the FCC good opportunity to get off the hook if it so chooses in a case that has been marked from beginning to end by incredible bumbling, fumbling and blundering. It is clear now that the Lamb case was conceived by an inept and fumbling Commission which bowed to pressures of the times when Communist hysteria was at its peak.

"The whole case with its recanting witnesses, charges of bribery, etc., was born of tortured logic within the Commission."

In one passage of the opinion Examiner Sharfman summarized the millions of words devoted to calculated assassination of my character:

"Lamb's possible naivete in allying himself with these groups cannot, on this record, be transformed into something more sinister; his professed sympathy with the underdog, his espousal of 'liberal' causes, and his prominence in the community, undoubtedly made him attractive to certain organizations; and the first two factors must also have made him personally susceptible.

"But to say that he was starry-eyed is not to conclude that his eyes must also have been shot with malevolent gleams.

"That Lamb was personally sympathetic to the Soviet regime for Russia, felt that planning was indispensable to an orderly and equitable society in that country, and that we could learn from and profit from Russian experiences, is manifested from his writings; but there is nothing to indicate that he called for the importation of Communism in the United States and destruction of American institutions."

There was still room for dilatory tactics, however, and the FCC lawyers used them to the full in an effort to delay consideration of Sharfman's favorable opinion by the commission. On February 6, 1956, Howard McGrath forced the issue with a brief which stated our position in these blunt words:

"It has now been three years since Lamb's licenses expired. This proceeding has been, in our opinion, unnecessarily protracted. The chief stockholder and applicant, Edward Lamb, holds interests in other broadcasting licenses whose license renewals also have been held in abeyance awaiting the outcoming of this proceeding. These licensees, as well as Mr. Lamb's family, have suffered, and continue to suffer, economic harm beyond calculation. A favorable decision by the Commission, if rendered immediately, can do partial justice only. The economic and social damage which has been done to Mr. Lamb personally can never be repaired, and it is extremely doubtful if the expenditures of hundreds of thousands of dollars by the Government can ever be justified.

"The only hope of this applicant is that this entire matter will be concluded at an early date. To this end, and with the belief that oral argument is unnecessary, applicant Lamb foregoes any request therefor and urges that the Broadcasting Bureau exceptions be denied and that the Examiner's decision be affirmed."

And so the Lamb case came finally before the presiding members of the Federal Communications Commission. It would remain there for more than another year before, on June 14, 1957, the FCC finally and grudgingly gave me clearance and renewed my radio and television licenses.

How could such a thing happen in these United States? It is easy enough to write off the "Lamb Case" as a product of the hysteria of the McCarthy era—one not different in kind from thousands of others that were less spectacular, and had less happy endings, because the victims did not, or could not, fight back.

It is proper enough to name that lurid period after Joe McCarthy. He was not the only practitioner of the dark art of the Red smear, nor the most expert, but he was the most callous and the most conspicuous. His malicious disregard for truth and for the elementary principles of justice, and his ruthless pursuit of his petty personal and political ends, set the tone for a horde of perverse ideologues, and provided an opportunity for the personal advancement of hundreds of cynical opportunists, in government and out.

But to blame it all on Joe McCarthy is like blaming the temperature on the thermometer. No one man could have ripped apart the fabric of our democratic processes, and so stained our national honor, without the acquiescence of those who sat in positions of power and trust.

In the beginning I did not believe that McCarthy and his kind would be allowed to run amuck with virtually no opposition from the responsible leaders of his own political party. At the outset Sherman Adams and Charles Willits, two of President Eisenhower's key White House assistants, assured me personally that they would help get the McCarthyites on the FCC to give me a fair hearing on the "unusual" charges brought against me. At one point Mr. Eisenhower himself remarked in response to a press conference question that he disliked what the government was doing with professional witnesses in the Lamb case. But there was no effective intervention against the disgraceful tactics that marked my trial until we had by our own efforts in the hearing room exposed the scandal so thoroughly that it could not be ignored—and until my own personal and political friends in the Senate and House had acted to make the Lamb case a cause célèbre.

It seemed to be a time when people of good-will suffered a sort of paralysis in the face of the marauding McCarthy and his followers. And as always happens under those circumstances the highbinders in government, and their allies and procurers on the outside, were free to operate without restraint—even though their real objectives had nothing whatever to do with the emotion-charged issue that had been used to promote public hysteria.

I must have seemed an ideal victim for those who saw an opportunity to cut me down for political purposes or financial gain. I was an outspoken liberal, a maverick businessman, and I was in a position where not only my reputation but my bank balance could be severely damaged. By simply examining my public record, which I have no disposition to hide since I am in fact rather proud of it, they could link me with causes many a conservative citizen would characterize as radical. In the Frantic Fifties it took no skill at all to bill me in newspaper headlines as a flaming Red by nudging the facts with a little innuendo, and the sly suggestion that there must be fire behind all that smoke.

Proving the charge against me turned out to be another matter, but I am sure that in the beginning those who touched off the attack were convinced that they would never have to face that necessity. There were many, as innocent as I, who did not stand and fight, but capitulated in the face of the first volley and "made arrangements" of the kind I have mentioned earlier. There were others who simply abandoned the field and let their adversaries gain the political or financial advantage they sought.

I am a fighter for causes by temperament, and always have been, which is possibly one of the reasons I am a controversial figure. But in the situation I faced the will to fight was not enough; one also had to have the means. And I was one of the few victims of that sordid era who could afford to mount a full-fledged counterattack against the massed resources of a federal agency, and stand by the guns for four grueling years. It cost me, first to last, around $900,000 to clear my name and protect my properties—a sum far beyond the reach of the hundreds of minor officials, hapless intellectuals, college professors, and innocent bystanders who were run down by the McCarthy juggernaut during the great witch-hunt.

Account must be taken, too, of the physical and emotional strain such a battle entails. I remember, without pride, the time when my self-restraint broke under the bullying of Prosecutor Powell and I yelled at him in the hearing room, "You're a lousy, lying legal prostitute." There was a riotous moment when Marie Natvig assaulted a lawyer with a water pitcher. These were symptoms of the pressures that affected all the parties during the hundreds of days of the interminable trial, the tensions that sent Examiner Sharfman to the hospital, and brought on the heart condition that removed Powell from the case.

This, then, is how this appalling thing happened to me. There remains the question of why it happened.

Venality, ambition, greed, personal malice – all these were involved, and in various combinations the deadly sins affected many of the principals. The political motivation to discredit a prominent Democrat was obvious – and it was undoubtedly compounded by the fact that I personally had crossed Joe McCarthy on occasions when I demanded that he meet the usual requirement of submitting advance scripts of his political speeches before they were broadcast over my stations. One did not easily get away with a refusal to bend the knee to the omnipotent McCarthy, and his hatchet-man, Roy Cohn.

Then, there was a great deal of money riding on the outcome of the Lamb case. This was the time when new television broadcasting frequencies were being made available by FCC, and the grant of one of those licenses in a major market area like Toledo was worth millions of dollars to the recipient. Under the circumstances there were usually several applicants for each of these plums, and the FCC had broad discretion in choosing among them. All, obviously, would be qualified so far as financial capacity, credit rating, and the like were concerned. The question would come down to an appraisal of the character of the licensee—the FCC's presumed judgment as to which of the contenders would best serve the "public interest, convenience, and necessity." Nothing could destroy character, and remove an applicant from contention, as quickly as a Red smear.

I do not suggest that all of my competitors behaved dishonorably in these circumstances; I have already cited the case of the Toledo Blade's editorial dismissing the original FCC charge of communism as "bunk." But there were some who were more than willing to take advantage of the situation and encourage the downfall of a man who stood between them and a multi-million-dollar property.

For these reasons, the FCC in any season operates in what amounts to the eye of a hurricane of political and financial influence, and the record is replete with cases in which commissioners—including Doerfer—and lesser functionaries have succumbed to temptation. I cannot prove, and do not charge, that any of the $60,000 that the influence-peddler sought from me to "fix" my case would have found its way to any person connected with the FCC had I paid it. It may be that the influence he offered for sale, if he actually had any, was personal, or political, and that he was simply an opportunist lining his own pocket.

The truculence of many of the lesser figures in the trial may have been no more than the product of ambition to make a good showing in a sensational case—and, after the travesty in which they were engaged had been exposed, a stubborn pride that prevented them from admitting they had been wrong. There came a point in the hearing, certainly, when the tide turned against the prosecution in such a dramatic fashion that many of those who had rigged evidence and influenced witnesses to lie under oath had reason to fear dismissal, and perhaps even prosecution and disbarment, unless they could somehow vindicate themselves by winning their case. There were shivers in the FCC staff when one of the appellate judges hearing argument on Marie Natvig's appeal from her perjury conviction repeatedly asked if "suborning perjury is not in itself a penitentiary offense."

In the end there was no real punishment of the guilty FCC lawyers, although some undoubtedly were shunted into oblivion and lost their place on the ladder of advancement. But there was some reform of FCC procedures, and—perhaps the most important victory I can claim—as a direct result of the revelations in the Lamb case the Immigration Service's pool of professional "consultants" was disbanded and the disgraceful practice of traducing American citizens with the testimony of hired witnesses was largely ended in the federal service.

A legal system is more than laws and procedures and institutions. It must rest on a tradition of simple decency, and it must be supported by the personal commitment to justice of those who operate within its shelter. It was here that we saw the tragic and alarming failure in my own case, and it was this that raised it far above an issue between a non-conformist lawyer-businessman and a collection of bureaucrats.

I have often stood before the bar as advocate for the underdog, demanding that the case against him be tried on its merits and not in terms of prejudice against his unpopular cause. Once I had so stood in defense of the Communist Louis Budenz. Now I once again shared a courtroom with Budenz, but I no longer enjoyed the detachment of an officer of the court whose own life would go on unaffected whatever the outcome of the case at issue. Now I sat in the seat of the accused, and heard Budenz blandly lie in the service of men who sought my destruction, and believed they would attain it.

It was then, for the first time, that I fully understood the words I have tried to live by—the testament and the prophecy uttered at the beginning of this Republic by Edward Livingston in opposition to the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798:

"If we are to violate the Constitution, will the people submit to our unauthorized acts? Sir, they ought not to submit; they would deserve the chains that these measures are forging for them. The country will swarm with informers, spies, delators and all the odious reptile tribe that breed in the sunshine of a despotic power. The hours of the most unsuspected confidence, the intimacies of friendship, or the recesses of domestic retirement afford no security.

"The companion whom you must trust, the friend in whom you must confide, the domestic who waits in your chamber, all are tempted to betray your imprudent or unguarded fellow; to misrepresent your words, to convey them, distorted by calumny, to the secret tribunal where jealousy presides; where fear officiates as accuser and suspicion is the only evidence that is heard. We are absurd enough to call ourselves 'free and enlightened' while we advocate principles that would have disgraced the age of Gothic barbarity and establish a code compared to which the ordeal is wise and the trial by battle is merciful and just."

Appendix

The "Lamb Case" is the lineal antecedent of the recent favorable ruling on the Pacifica Foundation's broadcasting licenses. Pacifica's educational radio stations in San Francisco, Los Angeles, and New York were subjected to a sustained attack by right-wing critics who charged that they had been infiltrated by Communists, and were guilty of broadcasting subversive, obscene, and otherwise controversial matter. [FROM THE INTRODUCTION]

The text of the FCC opinion and order on the "Pacifica Case" follows:

I. The Commission has before it for consideration the above pending applications of the listed broadcast stations licensed to Pacifica Foundation. There are three aspects to our consideration: (a) certain programming issues raised by complaints; (b) issues of possible Communist Party affiliation of principals of Pacifica; and (c) a question of possible unauthorized transfer of control. We shall consider each in turn.

2. Programming Issues. The principal complaints are concerned with five programs: (i) a December 12, 1959 broadcast over KPFA, at 10 p.m., of certain poems by Lawrence Ferlinghetti (read by the poet himself) (ii) The Zoo Story, a recording of the Edward Albee play broadcast over KPFK at 11 p.m., January 13, 1963 (iii) Live and Let Live, a program broadcast over KPFK at 10:15 p.m. on January 15, 1963, in which eight homosexuals discussed their attitudes and problems (iv) a program broadcast over KPFA at 7:15 p.m. on January 28, 1963, in which the poem, Ballad of the Despairing Husband, was read by the author Robert Creeley and (v) The Kid, a program broadcast at 11 p.m. on January 8, 1963 over KPFA, which consisted of readings by Edward Pomerantz from his unfinished novel of the same name. The complaints charge that these programs were offensive or "filthy" in nature, thus raising the type of issue we recently considered in Palmetto Bctg. Co., 33 F.C.C. 483 34 F.C.C. 101. We shall consider the above five matters in determining whether, on an overall basis, the licensee's programming met the public interest standard laid down in the Communications Act.[1] Report and Statement of Policy Re: Commission En Banc Programming Inquiry, 20 Pike & Fischer, R.R. 1901.

3. When the Commission receives complaints of the general nature here involved, its usual practice is to refer them to the licensee so as to afford the latter an opportunity to comment. When the Commission reviews, on an overall basis, the station's operation at the time of renewal, it thus has before it a complete file, containing all the sides of any matter which may have arisen during the license period. Specifically, with respect to the programming issue in this case, the Commission, barring the exceptions noted in the Programming Statement (supra, at p. 1909), is not concerned with individual programs—nor is it at any time concerned with matters essentially of licensee taste or judgment. Cf. Palmetto Bctg. Co., supra, par. 22. As shown by the cited case, its very limited concern in this type of case is whether, upon the overall examination, some substantial pattern of operation inconsistent with the public interest standard clearly and patently emerges. Unlike Palmetto where there was such a substantial pattern (id. at par. 23; see par. 7, infra) here we are dealing with a few isolated programs, presented over a four-year period. It would thus appear that there is no substantial problem, on an overall basis, warranting further inquiry.[2] While this would normally conclude the matter, we have determined to treat the issues raised by Pacifica's response to the complaints, because we think it would serve a useful purpose, both to the industry and the public. We shall therefore turn to a more detailed consideration of the issues raised by the complaints as to these five programs. Because of Pacifica's different response to the complaints as to (i) and (iv), par 2 above, we shall treat these two broadcasts separately (see pars. 6-7, infra).

4. There is, we think, no question but that the broadcasts of the programs, The Zoo Story, Live and Let Live, and The Kid, lay well within the licensee's judgment under the public interest standard. The situation here stands on an entirely different footing than Palmetto, supra, where the licensee had devoted a substantial period of his broadcast day to material which we found to be patently offensive—however much we weighted that standard in the licensee's favor—and as to which programming the licensee himself never asserted that it was not offensive or vulgar or that it served the needs of his area or had any redeeming features. In this case, Pacifica has stated its judgment that the three above-cited programs served the public interests and, specifically, the needs and interests of its listening public. Thus, it has pointed out that in its judgment The Zoo Story is a "serious work of drama" by an eminent and "provocative playwright"—that it is an "honest and courageous play" which Americans "who do not live near Broadway ought to have the opportunity to hear and experience. . . ." Similarly, as to The Kid, Pacifica states, with supporting authority, that Mr. Pomerantz is an author who has obtained notable recognition for his writings and whose readings from his unfinished novel were fully in the public interest as a serious work meriting the attention of its listeners; Pacifica further states that prior to broadcast the tape was auditioned by one of its employees who edited out two phrases because they did not meet Pacifica's broadcast standards of good taste; and that while "certain minor swear words are used, . . . these fit well within the context of the material being read and conform to the standards of acceptability of reasonably intelligent listeners." Finally, as to the program, Live and Let Live, Pacifica states that "so long as the program is handled in good taste, there is no reason why subjects like homosexuality should not be discussed on the air"; and that it "conscientiously believes that the American people will be better off as a result of hearing a constructive discussion of the problem rather than leaving the subject to ignorance and silence."

5. We recognize that as shown by the complaints here such provocative programming as here involved may offend some listeners. But this does not mean that those offended have the right, through the Commission's licensing power, to rule such programming off the airwaves. Were this the case, only the wholly inoffensive, the bland, could gain access to the radio microphone or TV camera. No such drastic curtailment can be countenanced under the Constitution, the Communications Act, or the Commission's policy, which has consistently sought to insure the "maintenance of radio and television as a medium of freedom of speech and freedom of expression for the people of the Nation as a whole" (Editorializing Report, 13 F.C.C. 1246, 1248). In saying this, we do not mean to indicate that those who have complained about the foregoing programs are in the wrong as to the worth of these programs and should listen to them. This is a matter solely for determination by the individual listeners. Our function, we stress, is not to pass on the merits of the program—to commend or to frown. Rather, as we stated (par. 3) it is the very limited one of assaying at the time of renewal whether the licensee's programming, on an overall basis, has been in the public interest and, in the context of this issue, whether he has made programming judgments reason-

1. The Commission may also enforce the standard of Section 1464 of Title 18 (dealing with "obscene, indecent, or profane language"). See Section 312(a), (b); Section 503 (b) (1) (E). In our view, enforcement proceedings under Section 1464 are not warranted, and therefore, no further consideration need be given this section.

2. While, for reasons developed in this opinion, it is unnecessary to detail the showings here, we have examined the licensee's overall showings as to its stations' operations and find that those operations did serve the needs and interests of the licensee's areas. Programming statement, supra, at pp. 1913-16. In this connection, we have also taken into account the showing made in the letter of April 16, 1963.

ably related to the public interest. This does not pose a close question in the case: Pacifica's judgments as to the above programs clearly fall within the very great discretion which the Act wisely vests in the licensee. In this connection, we also note that Pacifica took into account the nature of the broadcast medium when it scheduled such programming for the late evening hours (after 10 p.m., when the number of children in the listening audience is at a minimum).[3]

6. As to the Ferlinghetti and Creeley programs, the licensee asserts that in both instances some passages did not measure up to "Pacifica's own standards of good taste." Thus, it states that it did not carefully screen the Ferlinghetti tape to see if it met its standards "because it relied upon Mr. Ferlinghetti's national reputation and also upon the fact that the tape came to it from a reputable FM station." It acknowledges that this was a mistake in its procedures and states that "in the future Pacifica will make its own review of all broadcasts. . . ." With respect to the Creeley passage (i.e., the poem, Ballad of a Despairing Husband)[4], Pacifica again states that in its judgment it should not have been broadcast. It "does not excuse the broadcast of the poem in question" but it does explain how the poem "slipped by" KPFA's Drama and Literature Editor who auditioned the tape. It points out that prior to the offending poem Mr. Creeley, who "has a rather flat, monotonous voice," read 18 other perfectly acceptable poems—and that the station's editor was so lulled thereby that he did not catch the few offensive words in the 19th poem. It also points out that each of the nine poems which followed was again perfectly acceptable, and that before re-broadcasting the poem on its Los Angeles station, it deleted the objectionable verse.

7. In view of the foregoing, we find no impediment to renewal on this score. We are dealing with two isolated errors in the licensee's application of its own standards—one in 1959 and the other in 1963. The explanations given for these two errors are credible. Therefore, even assuming, arguendo, that the broadcasts were inconsistent with the public interest standard, it is clear that no unfavorable action upon the renewal applications is called for. The standard of public interest is not so rigid that an honest mistake or error on the part of a licensee results in drastic action against him where his overall record demonstrates a reasonable effort to serve the needs and interests of his community (see note 2, supra). Here again, this case contrasts sharply with Palmetto where instead of two isolated instances, years apart, we found that the patently offensive material was broadcast for a substantial period of the station's broadcast day for many years. See par. 3, supra.

8. We find, therefore, that the programming matters raised with respect to the Pacifica renewals pose no bar to a grant of renewal.[5] Our holding, as is true of all such holdings in this sensitive area, is necessarily based on, and limited to, the facts of the particular case. But we have tried to stress here, as in Palmetto, an underlying policy—that the licensee's judgment in this freedom of speech area is entitled to very great weight and that the Commission, under the public interest standard, will take action against the licensee at the time of renewal only where the facts of the particular case, established in a hearing record, flagrantly call for such action. We have done so because we are charged under the Act with "promoting the larger and more effective use of radio in the public interest" (Section 303(g)), and obviously, in the discharge of that responsibility, must take every precaution to avoid inhibiting broadcast licensees' efforts at experimenting or diversifying their programming. Such diversity of programming has been the goal of many Commission policies (e.g., multiple ownership, development of UHF, the fairness doctrine). Clearly, the Commission must remain faithful to that goal in discharging its functions in the actual area of programming itself.

9. Communist Party Affiliation Issue. Under the public interest standard, it is relevant and important for the Commission to determine in certain cases whether its applicants, or the principals of its applicants, for broadcast licenses or radio operator licenses, are members of the Communist Party or of organizations which advocate or teach the overthrow of the Government by force or violence. Sections 307(a), 307(d), 308(b), 309, 47 U.S.C. 307(a), 307(d), 308(b), 309; Borrow v. F.C.C., 285 F. 2d 666, 669, cert, den., 366 U.S. 904; Cronan v. F.C.C., 385 F. 2d 288 (C.A.D.C.), cert. den., 366 U.S. 904; Blumenthal v. F.C.C., 318 F 2d 276 (C.A.D.C.), cert. den., Case No. 1026, June 3, 1963; cf. Beilan v. Board of Education, 357 U.S. 399, 405; Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485, 493; Garner v. Los Angeles Board, 341 U.S. 716, 720; Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 527. The Commission therefore has followed a policy of inquiring as to Communist Party membership in those radio licensing situations where it has information making such inquiry appropriate. Because of

3. Pacifica states that it "is sensitive to its responsibilities to its listening audience and carefully schedules for late night broadcasts those programs which may be misunderstood by children although thoroughly acceptable to an adult audience."

4. The program containing this passage was a taped recording of Mr. Creeley's readings of selections from his poetry to students at the University of California. KPFA broadcasts many such poetry readings at the University, which are recorded by a University employee for the school's archives (and made available to the station).

5. One other programming aspect deserves emphasis. Complaint has also been made concerning Pacifica's presentation of "far-left" programming. Pacifica has stated that it follows a policy of presenting programs covering the widest range of the political or controversial issue spectrum—from the members of the Communist Party on the left to members of the John Birch Society on the right. Again, we point out that such a policy (which must, of course, be carried out consistently with the requirements of the fairness doctrine) is within the licensee's area of programming judgment.

information coming to the Commission's attention from several sources, the Commission requested information from Pacifica Foundation on this score. On the basis of information obtained from Government sources, the Foundation, and our own inquiry, we do not find any evidence warranting further inquiry into the qualifications in this respect of Pacifica Foundation.

10. Unauthorized Transfer of Control. Until September 30, 1961, control of Pacifica was vested in Executive Members, who elected a Committee of Directors, who in turn elected officers and controlled the Foundation's activities. On September 30, 1961, the Executive Membership and the Committee of Directors were abolished. In their place, Pacifica is controlled—pursuant to its by-laws—by a Board of Directors, which elects officers and controls the Foundation's activities. The new by-laws which accomplished this result were appropriately reported to the Commission at the time they were adopted. However, no application for consent to a transfer of control was then filed.

11. This matter was brought to Pacifica's attention by a letter of February 7, 1963. The licensee's response of April 26, 1963, takes the position that no transfer of actual control had in fact taken place. However, in the event that the Commission deemed an application for consent to transfer of control to be necessary, Pacifica simultaneously filed such an application (BTC-4284). Pacifica argues that, in actual practice, control had been in the so-called Committee of Directors, and that this practice had been formalized in an amendment to the by-laws of October 20, 1960, which read, in relevant part:

"Except as hereinafter provided, the powers of this corporation shall be exercised, its property controlled, and its affairs conducted by a Committee of Directors which shall consist of twenty-one Executive Members of this Corporation."

The new Board of Directors, elected on September 30, 1961, was identical with the then existing Committee of Directors, and the officers of the Foundation likewise remained the same.

12. Although the September 30, 1961 revision in the by-laws does appear to have been only the formal recognition of a development in the actual control of Pacifica which had occurred over a period of years, and although there may well be merit in Pacifica's contention that changes in the composition of its Executive Membership (or, for that matter, of its present Board of Directors) should not be regarded as transfers of control, the September 30, 1961 revision in the by-laws did transfer legal control. Prior to that date, the Executive Membership elected directors, who elected officers. After that date, the directors themselves have elected new directors, as well as officers. The fact that the legal control vested in the Executive Members did not, in practice, amount to actual control, does not mean that its existence can be ignored—any more than the legal control of a 51% stockholder in a commercial corporation can be ignored because he fails to exercise it. See ABC-Paramount Merger case, 8 Pike & Fischer, R.R. 541, 619; Press-Union Publishing Co., Inc., 7 Pike & Fischer, R.R. 83, 96; Universal Carloading Co. v. Railroad Retirement Board, 71 F. Supp. 369.

13. On the other hand, it is clear that Pacifica did not seek to conceal or misrepresent any facts concerning those who control its affairs, and that the failure to file involved was an excusable one. We therefore grant the pending application for transfer of control.

14. Conclusion. In view of the foregoing, it is ordered, this 22nd day of January, 1964, that the above-entitled applications of Pacifica Foundation ARE GRANTED as serving the public interest, convenience and necessity.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION
Ben F. Waple, Secretary

Concurring Statement of Commissioner Robert E. Lee

I concur in the action of the Commission in granting the several applications of Pacifica Foundation. However, I feel constrained to comment on at least one program coming to our attention insofar as it may or may not reflect these stations' program policies.

Having listened carefully and painfully to a 1½ hour tape recording of a program involving self-professed homosexuals, I am convinced that the program was designed to be, and succeeded in being, contributory to nothing but sensationalism. The airing of a program dealing with sexual aberrations is not to my mind per se a violation of good taste nor contrary to the public interest. When these subjects are discussed by physicians and sociologists, it is conceivable that the public could benefit. But a panel of eight homosexuals discussing their experiences and past history does not approach the treatment of a delicate subject one could expect by a responsible broadcaster. A microphone in a bordello, during slack hours, could give us similar information on a related subject. Such programs, obviously designed to be lurid and to stir the public curiosity, have little place on the air.

I do not hold myself to be either a moralist or a judge of taste. Least of all do I have a clear understanding of what may constitute obscenity in broadcasting.

SPECIAL REPORT

Latins try togetherness

The republics south of the border face huge economic problems brought on by poverty, inflation, and payments imbalance

Many of their leaders see economic integration—formation of a Latin American Common Market—as their best hope for internal stability and protection of their industries

On his visit to Punta del Este, President Johnson offers U.S. aid—political and practical—to ease the path to unity

A few years ago, in the aftermath of Fidel Castro's takeover in Cuba, Latin America seemed on the edge of violent social revolution. Guerrilla bands were forming in remote mountain and jungle fastnesses. Riots rocked the slums of Caracas and Rio de Janeiro. Economies faltered as businessmen—local and foreign—funneled money to havens abroad in anticipation of the explosion.

But the explosion hasn't come—and it looks now as though it won't. In a quiet but nonetheless dramatic turnabout, Latin America seems to be settling into a period of relative calm. The forces for change have been channeled along evolutionary routes.

"A revolution is under way," says a publisher in Santiago, "but it is a peaceful one."

Shifts. Here are some of the reasons for his optimism:

- Foreign investment hit a 10-year low in 1962, but now it is coming back. U.S. companies, which have a total of $11-billion invested in the area, are moving in with more. Copper production in Chile will be doubled with an additional $400-million investment. Union Carbide, Allied Chemical, Phillips Petroleum, and others have earmarked well over $200-million for petrochemical plants in Venezuela and Brazil.
- Strong popular support is behind the social-minded governments of such countries as Chile, Venezuela, and Peru.
- Reforms have brought about enough social progress in some areas so that hope is beginning to replace desperation among the underprivileged.

But the biggest change of all is political. Without the distraction of imminent revolutionary threats, Latin American governments now are better able to come to grips with the underlying economic and social ills that beset their countries. Says a university professor in Colombia: "We have time to maneuver."

U.S. backing. A search for practical ways to take advantage of this breathing spell is what took President Johnson to the Uruguayan beach resort of Punta del Este this week for a meeting with Latin American presidents. In what U.S. Secretary of State Dean Rusk hailed as the most important decision since their independence from Spain and Portugal, Latin presidents have pledged themselves to work toward economic integration. The aim is to pull together 19 economies into a single Latin American Common Market, within which goods and capital can flow freely, by 1985.

The U.S. role will be to provide political and financial push to get the idea in motion. Part of this will come in the form of extra funds—perhaps $1.5-billion worth over the next five years—to help finance some of the necessary underpinning, such as regional communications facilities and multinational power and highway projects.

In another important move, Washington officials at midweek acknowledged that the U.S. might be ready to loosen the strings on its aid to Latin nations by allowing them to use Alliance for Progress loans to finance purchases from each other. In the past, the U.S. has insisted that foreign purchases financed by Alliance money be made in the U.S. In the short run, untying aid might result in some slight drain on the U.S. balance of payments. But it would give the Latins a big psychological boost, as well as offer real possibilities for hastening the integration of a region more noted in the past for its divergencies than for its unity.

Responsibility. Latin America, an immense region stretching from the Rio Grande to Patagonia, became part of the empires of Spain and Portugal in the 16th Century. Its culture still is basically Iberian, despite intermarriage by the original conquerers and their descendants with Indians and Negro slaves, and a big influx of Europeans in this century to countries such as Argentina, Brazil, and Venezuela.

This racial mixture has produced a virile people, proud of their traditions, with a strong creative talent that has shown up in all the arts and most spectacularly in architecture. But the Latin genius has not been manifest in the art of politics. The Latins have a hard time bending their intense individualism to the common good, and this shortcoming has taken its toll in a seesaw series of government overthrows and military coups.

However, moves such as the current one toward economic integration reflect the emergence of a more responsible government leadership in the area. Ernst Keller, who lives in Lima and manages Adela S.A., a $30-million investment company for Latin America set up by U.S. and European banks and corporations, sums it up this way:

"The masses in Latin America have gained a considerable amount of political maturity. You can feel it. The result is more orderly procedures and fewer overthrows of constitutional governments. When such regimes are overthrown, it is usually for justifiable economic reasons. Developing countries with small budgets and marginal foreign reserves simply can't put up with messy governments."

The other side

All this doesn't mean that conditions have uniformly improved. Although Lima is off on a building spree and Caracas expects one as the government steps up pre-election spending, Brazil's economy still is showing the strains of a three-year belt-tightening by which its government has been trying to stifle inflation. Argentina is bracing for hard times, as its military government puts an austerity program into effect.

Resurgent militarism, in fact, also has brought some steps backward in the area of political freedom. Latin America's two largest nations, Brazil and Argentina, now are under authoritarian military regimes that have strait-jacketed political liberty. There are symptoms of military restiveness in Venezuela, and a right-wing terrorist movement has emerged in Guatemala.

Rich and poor. It's also evident that the ingredients of violent upheaval still are present—and in some areas multiplying. Shocking extremes of wealth and poverty still exist. The housing shortage is growing. Food output keeps just a jump ahead of Latin America's explosive population growth of almost 3% a year.

Right now, the region holds nearly 250-million people. By the year 2000, if the growth rate isn't checked, they will number 600-million. Economic expansion needed to provide them with food, shelter, and jobs isn't coming fast enough. Last year, the per-capita gain was only half the 2.5% set as a minimum Alliance for Progress target. Most of the countries are still struggling with inflation.

Meanwhile, the gap in wealth between Latin America and the industrialized part of the world is widening. In the last decade, per-capita income in Latin America has increased by $40, against $175 for the developed countries.

Reversal. Nor does the new situation in Latin America mean that the advocates of violence have given up trying. In Venezuela, the Castroite Fuerzas Armadas de Liberacion Nacional (FALN) still tosses bombs, usually in the direction of a U.S.

company. There is renewed guerrilla activity in Colombia. This month, Bolivian troops were out hunting a small guerrilla band in the Amazonian jungle.

Still, there has been a reversal in expectations. No longer are the Marxist revolutionaries convinced they are riding the wave of the future (page 120). They are on the defensive, divided on tactics. A basic split came into the open in Venezuela last month over the assassination of the foreign minister's brother. While the outlawed Venezuelan Communist Party leaders hastily disavowed the act, Castro scornfully denounced them as cowards and collaborators with the government.

In fact, the image of Castro as a Latin messiah has been tarnished throughout the hemisphere. The 1963 Cuban missile crisis revealed him to millions as a reckless adventurer gambling with nuclear war or, at best, a pawn in Russia's struggle with the U. S. Says a U. S. official in Venezuela: "Few probably would agree with me, but I think a case could be made showing that Castro has meant a net gain for the U. S. in Latin America."

Faltering Alliance

That was hardly apparent back in 1961, when the U. S. and Latin officials launched the Alliance for Progress at Punta del Este. With the challenge of Castro still fresh, and the stoning of Vice-President Nixon during a South American tour a recent memory, the mood in Washington was close to panic.

Amid loud fanfare, ambitious plans were announced to stave off violent revolution with a $20-billion, 10-year program to promote the welfare of and bring greater social justice to the restless masses of Latin America. Since then, President Johnson has extended the life of the Alliance for another 10 years.

So far, the U. S. has dropped $6.6-billion into the Alliance hopper for schools, highways, water-works, sewage systems, and housing units. A major chunk has gone into emergency aid to keep off the rocks countries whose balance-of-payments positions have gotten out of whack. But, funds from other developed countries and private capital have failed to come up to expectations.

Little change. The Alliance has proved a valuable training ground for Latin economists in drawing up monetary and development plans. It has provided support for officials charged with putting through tax reforms.

Undoubtedly, the Alliance has helped defuse the time bomb of Latin America's "rising expectations." But six years after its birth, it's clear that the Alliance hasn't attained its major objectives. It has not brought rapid and sustained economic growth. It has not yet produced substantial changes in economic and social structures. In view of what has happened in Brazil and Argentina, it is questionable whether it can be credited with strengthening democratic processes.

Nor has it infused the Latin Americans with any sense of mission or dedication. "One of the most serious criticisms of the Alliance," says President Eduardo Frei Montalva of Chile, "is that the people have not been able to participate in it." In the words of a government official in Lima: "It has developed into a dialogue among economists."

Why integration?

This is where economic integration could fit in. Latin American unity, in one form or another, is an old aspiration that has been gaining acceptance among wide segments of the population. The U. S. has belatedly seized on the idea in hopes of revitalizing the Alliance and giving it the political drive and purpose it was missing.

There are two clear-cut reasons why Latin American proponents of integration see it as the best hope for economic progress within their countries.

- It would offer better opportunities for industrial expansion by providing wider markets while protecting manufacturers in Latin America from competition with products of developed lands.
- Latin countries could speak with one voice on trade and tariff policies toward the industrial countries that provide markets for Latin America's commodities.

Stacked deck. Underlying these arguments is the feeling, widespread among Latin governments, that Latin America gets the short end of the stick in world trade. Says a high Colombian official: "The cards are stacked against us." Trade is the biggest source of discord between Latins and the U. S.

Latin Americans complain that prices for the manufactures they import have been rising faster than the prices of the agricultural commodities that generally are their leading exports. Statistics tend to bear them out. In the past decade, while the value of exports from industrial countries climbed by 10%, Latin exports rose only 3.9%. And much of this increase was eaten up by payments on the mounting load of foreign debt (chart, page 108).

Furthermore, the Latins object to the preferential treatment that European governments grant imports from their former African colonies. And they charge that U. S. subsidies to American growers of cotton and sugar beets, as well as quotas on imports of such products as cotton textiles, are artificial barriers to Latin American goods in the U. S. market.

Diversifying. Some Latins even go so far as to charge that U. S. policy toward Latin America is one of "aid not trade," and suggest that the U. S. should give preferential treatment to Latin American exports. Washington replies that such a policy runs contrary to basic U. S. philosophy of liberalizing world trade, and that the Latins should concentrate instead on diversifying their economies and developing new export lines.

Some progress in this direction has been made. Colombia is investing in slaughterhouses to boost exports of meat. Peru has developed its fishmeal industry into the nation's No. 1 dollar earner, ahead even of minerals. Brazil is cutting back on coffee production and fostering the growing of corn, for which there is a market abroad.

Such diversification, plus integration, could go a long way toward helping Latin America speed its growth.

On the fire. In fact, the movement toward integration already is under way. Seven years ago, the little Central American republics, with the exception of Panama, formed their own Central American Common Market (CACM). They have been making rapid strides. With the help of foreign investment in such things as refrigerator plants and pharmaceutical laboratories, their economies have perked up, growing an average of 6% a year, compared to 4.5% for the 10 years prior to CACM's formation.

The larger Latin American countries, too, have dipped a tentative toe into the current toward economic cooperation by forming the Latin American Free Trade Assn. (LAFTA). But LAFTA has been lagging. Less than 10% of the trade of LAFTA countries is with other members. LAFTA is now six years old, but there has been little expansion of the limited list of products freely traded within the area.

The task now will be to weld the CACM and LAFTA systems together. The Common Market also would have to include another subregional group now forming among Chile, Colombia, probably Venezuela, and possibly Peru.

Getting a Common Market going will be no easy piece of diplomacy. Topographical barriers and vast distances—and sometimes political differences—separate many of the would-be partners. The president of land-locked Bolivia announced he wouldn't come to Punta del Este this week, because his country's old dispute with Chile over access to the sea wasn't placed on the agenda. The larger countries of Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico are well along the path of industrialization, with big consumer markets of their own to feed. The smaller nations want guarantees that they will share in the process of industrializing, and won't merely be relegated to the role of captive markets for Latin America's Big Three.

Beginning at home

Nevertheless, the trend toward "economic togetherness" in Latin America is unmistakable, beginning within national boundaries. Nearly all the countries are bent on bringing their remote and backward regions into the mainstream of national life.

Brazil, for example, is parlaying government spending with fiscal favors to private enterprise in a push to develop its depressed northeast and empty Amazon regions, while thrusting roads toward its border with Peru. Bolivia is building roads into its fertile lands east of the Andes and encouraging settlement there, partly by Japanese immigrants. President Fernando Belaunde Terry of Peru is doing much the same in his country with the "Marginal Highway" project, which eventually is to become part of a road system running from Venezuela south to Bolivia.

Nationalism. Integration, on both national and international levels, is a big part of what Latins want today. But they also want broader opportunities in education and jobs for those at the lower end of the social scale, greater control over their own natural resources, and protection from the vagaries of world markets for commodities such as cotton, coffee, and sugar.

To a considerable extent, these objectives add up to nationalism—though not the extreme variety favored by Marxists who want to nationalize foreign-owned industries.

There has been an upswing in anti-American nationalist feeling in Brazil recently among industrialists. They complain that they have been competing at a disadvantage against says Irving Koss, Vice President and General Manager, E. F. Johnson Company, Waseca, Minn.

"If Johnson has a hidden weapon," Mr. Koss continues, "it's the work force. I have never been in a plant where there was more diligence, less goofing off, more desire to come in and do a day's work than here."

In Minnesota, The E. F. Johnson Company's experience is not unique! Industry thrives in Minnesota because the average Minnesotan is an unusually skilled and remarkably creative employee.

Those firms able to compare their Minnesota plant output with operations elsewhere find the Minnesota employees exceptionally productive . . . and profitable.

You see, Minnesotans believe in the wisdom of investing in people. That's why so many Minnesotans complete high school or one of Minnesota's many trade schools. And that's why Minnesota enjoys the distinction of being one of the leading states in the number of Ph.D.'s per million population.

Ask any of the Nation's fastest growing industries who have plants in Minnesota what they think of their Minnesota location. They'll tell you in no uncertain terms . . . "You'd like it here!"

U. S. and other foreign companies which have been able to bring in foreign funds to help them weather a critical credit squeeze. A Peruvian industrialist says: "We know our countries must develop. But we aren't going to leave the job entirely to foreigners."

No easy way. Many of these goals, of course, are old ones. The difference today lies in how Latins are trying to attain them. Latins increasingly are solving their problems in down-to-earth, pragmatic fashion, with a minimum of faith in magic formulas.

At one time, there was hopeful talk among some Latins of associating with the Afro-Asian nations in a common economic and political front against the industrial powers. Latin Americans now realize this was a pipe-dream; the Africans and Asians are, in fact, competitors of the Latin American nations in world markets with such products as coffee and minerals.

Pragmatism. Today's Latin American leaders also are less bound up in ideologies than many were in the past. The present governments of Chile and Venezuela have a strong tincture of socialism; but they are going into partnership deals with private foreign capital—in copper in Chile, and in petrochemicals in Venezuela. Last year, Brazil's military-run regime, though fiercely anti-Communist, signed a $100-million trade and investment agreement with the Russians.

Latin governments also are beginning to face up to the problem of population pressures, a touchy subject in a heavily Catholic society. Government doctors and nurses are giving instruction in family planning and birth control in Venezuela, Colombia, and Costa Rica. Four other countries have official family-planning programs, and the U. S. Agency for International Development (AID) is furnishing $2.2-million this year for studies to help Latin countries control their population explosion. This week, in Santiago, Chile, the International Planned Parenthood Federation is holding a world conference at which the host government is officially represented.

These are some of the ways Latin America has been going about solving its problems. Commonly, Latin America is lumped together with Asia and Africa as part of the "underdeveloped" world. But societies that can produce the big, modern cities of Sao Paulo, Buenos Aires, and Mexico City obviously can't be placed in the same category with most of the African and Asian nations.

The face of Mexico: benign despite warts

The country whose record for development is the envy of other Latins undoubtedly is Mexico, unique in Latin America for having achieved durable political stability and steady economic growth. In large part, this is the result of the nation's 1911 revolution, which broke up the estates of the oligarchy, gave land to the peasants, brought social reforms, and produced a benevolent, one-party dictatorship of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI). The system works well, because it provides some voice within PRI for all sectors of the population.

Of course, Mexico wouldn't be part of Latin America if all were progress and prosperity. The country has a host of problems. The population, now some 43-million, is expanding at a rate of 3.5% a year. Last year, the economy was able to provide only 150,000 jobs for the 400,000 new workers that entered the work force. Nearly half the people are members of families earning less than $1,000 annually. Good farm land is scarce; its area can be expanded only with heavy expenditures for irrigation.

Cycles. Still, Mexico has come a long way since the bloody days of revolution. Today, its pesos are hard currency for international trade. Its healthy, diversified economy is growing by 6% a year, based on minerals, agriculture, manufacturing, and its tourist industry, worth $1-billion a year—equal to a quarter of of the federal budget.

Ordaz, the trend is a bit to the left, with emphasis on economic nationalism and stiff-backed independence of the U. S. in foreign policy. Mexico is the only Latin American nation still maintaining relations with Cuba.

Foreign companies complain of increasing government regulation and pressure to Mexicanize—that is, take in Mexican partners, either private or governmental. As a result of this pressure, Pan American Sulphur Co. just last week agreed to sell two-thirds of its Mexican subsidiary to the Mexican government and private Mexican investors. Texas Gulf Sulphur has done the same thing.

Despite this, foreign investors have confidence in the country's future. New money is coming in at the rate of $200-million a year. U. S. businessmen alone have invested over $1-billion, in everything from auto making to food processing. Right now, companies such as Texas Gulf, Hooker Chemical, and National Bulk Carriers are preparing new investment plans in expectation that the Mexican government will grant more sulfur concessions.

Brazil and Argentina: the erratic giants

In sharp contrast with Mexico, Brazil and Argentina—Latin America's two largest nations—have been going through a period of dizzying political and economic ups and downs. Both now are under military regimes which hope to solve by fiat tough problems that past democratic regimes failed to overcome.

In Brazil, for example, the congress, shorn of most of its powers under a new constitution, has no say whatever in the federal budget. In Argentina, the military last year simply abolished the congress along

Bad times in the guerrilla trade

Revolution is an old Latin custom. Latin Americans have many ways of changing governments, quite a few of them violent: wars of independence, peasant insurrections, power grabs by ambitious colonels, palace coups. Mexico's revolution was one of this century's greatest upheavals; it lasted more than a decade and took an estimated 2-million lives.

Since Fidel Castro's takeover in Cuba in 1959, Latin American firebrands have been trying with little success to apply his formula for revolution: a Marxist-oriented guerrilla movement striking from remote bases in mountains and jungles. For several years, Communist guerrilla bands have been marauding in the backlands of Venezuela, Guatemala, and Colombia (where they compete with numerous bandit gangs). Now, guerrilla fighting has broken out in Bolivia.

Division. Still, all these groups, together probably numbering not more than 1,000 men, so far have not been able to attract broad support. Of course, Castro started with only a handful. But his imitators lack the ingredient that was vital to Castro's success —backing from Cubans of all classes, who were fed up with the corrupt and brutal dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista. Widespread disillusion with Castro after he unveiled his Communism has made it virtually impossible for would-be Latin revolutionaries to muster the same kind of popular support, even in countries with unpopular governments.

In addition, Latin Communists themselves are bitterly divided over how to spread their influence. Throughout Latin America, most old-line, Moscow-oriented Communist parties currently are trying to work through legal political channels, and are making alliances with non-Communist parties whenever they can. Such devious tactics enrage Castro and his impatient disciples.

Latin revolutionaries may still get a chance to spark violent upheaval—if the region fails to make headway against massive economic and social ills. But for the present, many revolutionaries admit that the time isn't ripe. Writing in a French leftist publication, Marxist Henri Edmé acknowledged sourly: "We can no longer speak of the revolution in Latin America as imminent, inevitable, triumphant." The influence of the U. S. and modern capitalism, Edmé lamented, has "gained the initiative and the upper hand."

with all political parties. Both countries now are in the mold of authoritarian Spain and Portugal.

Credit habit. In huge Brazil—almost as big as the rest of South America and with a population of 83-million—the military came to power just three years ago. They tossed out a leftist government that had run the country into economic chaos, and gave the job of rescuing the economy from runaway inflation to a team of economists headed by Roberto Campos.

Through tight credit restrictions, higher taxes, wage curbs, and a holddown in government spending, Campos managed to cut back inflation to 43% last year; but he failed to lick it. In fact, inflation seems as permanent a feature of the country as the Portuguese language. Says a stockbroker in Rio de Janeiro: "If you don't give Brazilians credit, they'll take it anyway. There's been a small-scale boom recently along the highways around Brasilia. How was it financed? By promissory notes and bad checks."

No contest. The government of former army Marshal Humberto Castelo Branco, who left office last month, was composed mostly of military intellectuals and economists. Its successor is made up of tough-fisted generals and representatives of local businessmen. They are highly critical of former Planning Minister Campos' program, which sent business into a slump.

The new leadership is determined to get things rolling again. It will relax credit, ease up on wage restraints, and probably give business some tax relief. This probably will mean inflation of 30% to 35% this year. To win sympathy from labor and student groups, new President Arthur da Costa e Silva also plans to push housing and educational projects. Meanwhile, Brazil continues to get the lion's share of Alliance for Progress aid.

As for steps toward democracy, though, the military rulers are unlikely to allow anything more than a tame opposition. The outgoing government bequeathed to Costa e Silva a set of harsh repressive measures, including a clampdown on the press and a national security law so strict that it compels employers to fire anyone even accused of subversion.

Opening move. The military in Argentina—a true caste more than anywhere else in Latin America—are finding out for themselves that it is easier to oust a government than run a country. One of their problems has been reaching agreement among themselves on what policies to follow.

However, after months of marking time, strongman General Juan Carlos Ongania finally is beginning to put into effect a program aimed at curbing inflation and putting the economy on a sounder footing for future growth. It follows the pattern of action recently taken in Brazil: orthodox monetary and fiscal measures designed to stimulate private enterprise.

Toughest measure so far was last month's 40% devaluation of the peso, as a followup to two less drastic devaluations. This opens the door to a $300-million credit package from the International Monetary Fund, the U. S. Treasury, and private foreign banks. At the same time, foreign oil companies whose contracts were canceled by ousted President Arturo Illia are being invited back with offers of outright concessions. This week, the government announced agreements with Standard Oil (Indiana) and Cities Service under which the two companies will continue to produce oil in Argentina.

The government also is pushing an export campaign, with radio stations plugging the motto: "To export is to grow."

Labor woes. On the labor front, the government is playing it somewhat by ear. In effect, it has told the powerful General Labor Confederation it can continue as a labor organization so long as it stays out of politics. A few weeks ago, the military backed up this edict by revoking the charters and freezing the funds of six unions that staged a 24-hour strike to protest government policies.

The place of labor in the nation's political life has been the crux of Argentina's political woes in recent years. Ever since the 1955 overthrow of dictator Juan Domingo Peron, whose power base was the unions, labor has been cast in the role of political pariah. Since many union leaders are still faithful to the aging Peron, an exile in Spain, there will probably be no real solution to the problem until he dies.

Venezuela and the Pacific republics

While Brazil and Argentina, along with neighboring Bolivia, are seeking to solve their problems through authoritarian regimes, Venezuela and the Pacific Coast countries have been generally sticking to constitutional democracy based on popularly elected governments. On the whole, they have been doing better than their military neighbors, in both economic growth and social progress—with the exception of tiny, backward Ecuador.

Oil-rich Venezuela is heading into another boom period. A lengthy tax dispute with foreign oil producers has been settled with a new formula providing Venezuela with several hundred million dollars in additional income. The agreement is expected to keep peace between Venezuela's left-of-center government and the companies for the next five years. Meanwhile, the government plans to open new oil areas to exploration bv offering the companies drilling contracts.

New plans. Venezuela's big drive is to develop new sources of wealth besides oil. It is building a metallurgical complex at the mouth of the Orinoco River that will use nearby iron ore and cheap hydroelectric power. (The big Guri Dam, source of the power, is proving a headache for its builder, Kaiser Engineers. Kaiser reportedly was off by some $50-million on its cost estimates, and is trying to get the Venezuelans to pay the extra amount.)

Venezuela also is going ahead with plans for a huge petrochemical complex, in partnership with foreign capital and with the export market chiefly in mind. The state-owned Venezuelan Petrochemical Institute is setting up joint companies with Union Carbide, Allied Chemical, Shell, and Phillips Petroleum to make polyethylene, synthetic rubber, nitrogen fertilizers, and other products. Initial investment will be $100-million, but the final total will run many times that amount. Some 30 other projects are under study.

zuela's future is the problem of air pollution in the U. S. and the measures being taken to fight it. The fuel oil that Venezuela sells in large quantities to the U. S. is high in sulfur, a chief villain in pollution. To reduce the sulfur content to acceptable levels, the oil companies operating in Venezuela would have to install $100-million worth of equipment. Unless they do, the U. S. may place stricter curbs on imports of Venezuelan oil.

Decisive steps. Neighboring Colombia has been having a rough time recently, with inflation, an explosive growth in population, unemployment now running about 20% of the work force, and a critical balance-of-payments problem due to a drop in returns from exports of coffee and other agricultural products.

Under President Carlos Lleras Restrepo, however, the government elected last year on a platform of "national transformation" has been taking decisive steps to give the nation a broader, more diversified economy. Just last month, the government decreed a de facto devaluation of the peso. It set a lower exchange rate for coffee than for other products. Through this, the government hopes to discourage overproduction of coffee and stimulate exports of meat and textiles, and other goods.

This step, coupled with such deflationary measures as tax increases and credit restrictions, has won the Classic formula. Of all major Latin American countries, Peru comes closest to following a policy of classic economic liberalism. The policy has brought liberal returns. Helped by a heavy influx of foreign capital into mining and manufacturing, plus rising prices in the world copper market in the past few years, Peru's economy is heading for another prosperous year with a growth rate of between 5% and 6%.

Evidence of increasing prosperity is everywhere in the capital city of Lima: new auto assembly plants going up, new public works, and a better-dressed populace.

Paradoxically, increased prosperity has been adding to Lima's woes, as more and more poor people from the backlands pour into the city's ramshackle hillside "barriados," or slums. Despite the filth and overcrowding, the newcomers' life there is preferable to rural poverty and isolation. But many have heard about President Belaunde's scheme for distributing land along the Marginal Highway and other roads the government is building in the interior. They are expecting to be given a homestead.

This is an example of the pressures on social-minded governments in Latin America to deliver on their promises. In Peru's case, it is leading to the familiar Latin dilemma: a choice between growth or stability. Economists are worried by signs that Peru's rate of inflation is picking up as a result of government spending—as well as the demands of private business for credit.

Chilean dynamo. What may be Latin America's most dynamic political leadership these days is to be found in slender Chile, a country that stretches more than 2,500 mi. from its northern deserts to sub-Antarctic Cape Horn. Christian Democrat President Frei is one of the staunchest advocates of a Latin American Common Market. He came to office two years ago pledged to carry out a "revolution within freedom." Despite roadblocks thrown up by ultra-conservatives and a Socialist-Communist coalition, he is coming close to doing just that.

His administration has increased school enrollment by 17%, financed construction of low-cost houses by the thousands. Now Frei has the legislation needed for his land-reform program, aimed at creating 100,000 new small farms. Helped by higher world prices for copper, the economy is expanding. Last year, industrial output went up 9%. Next to Brazil, Chile has been the biggest recipient of Alliance aid, but Frei turned down an offer of an $80-million loan this year on the grounds Chile didn't need it.

Revenge at polls. To be sure, Frei still has plenty of problems on his hands. Profit margins have been shrinking, and credit is tight. Inflation still is a bugaboo: The government hoped to keep the cost-of-living increase down to 12% this year, but it already has passed 8%.

Agriculture remains the biggest weak spot. Chile has been importing around $150-million worth of foodstuffs a year, much of which it could grow itself. But there actually has been disinvestment in agriculture recently, prompted by uncertainty among farmers over how the land reform would be executed.

Reaction to this partial squeeze showed up in this month's municipal elections, in which the Christian Democrats' share of the vote dropped 5%. However, another element came into play at the polls. Many middle- and upper-class Chileans supported Frei in 1964 as the only viable alternative to the Socialist-Communist candidate, Salvador Allende. They expected a deal. It came as a shock to them that Frei meant business when he talked of reforms. In addition, conservatives fear that left-wing radicals among the Christian Democrats will get control of the party. Says a business executive: "The U. S. is helping to create a Frankenstein monster."

Hole card. On the other hand, Allende scoffs at Christian Democrat claims of representing a revolution. "Their objectives may be more humane," he says, "but they are committed to capitalism and U. S. imperialism."

The ace up Frei's sleeve is the new arrangement reached with the big U. S. producers of Chilean copper. In partnership with the government, Kennecott, Anaconda, and Cerro Corp. are investing some $400-million to double Chile's copper output to 1.2-million tons a year by 1971. This week, the U. S. Export-Import Bank granted a $110-million loan to Kennecott's subsidiary to help finance expansion.

Latin America's laggard nations

Lacking Chile's copper or Venezuela's oil is a group of Latin countries that has to work much harder just to stay even. It includes the six Central American republics, the Dominican Republic and Haiti, which share the Caribbean island of Hispaniola, the Andean nation of Bolivia, and grazing-land countries of Uruguay and Paraguay. Within the group are Latin America's poorest peoples: Per-capita insome in Haiti, for example, is $75 a year.

Five of the Central American states, however, have gone a long way toward solving their problems by forming a Common Market. But the others have been doing less well. Uruguay has nearly bankrupted itself with social-welfare schemes. Another problem has been its collegiate form of government, or rule by council, in which conflicting opinions and policies of its members often canceled each other. Earlier this year, the country voted to junk the system in favor of a presidential type of government.

Best hope. In the Dominican Republic, where a conservative government was elected last year, the economy still is suffering from the effects of the turmoil that brought U. S. intervention in 1965.

Bolivia's big problem is how to run its government-owned tin mines efficiently. President René Barrientos, the former Air Force general who led a military coup in 1964, is encouraging foreign capital into new mining ventures, which could drain off excess labor from the government's own mines. At the same time, he is trying to get some of his people down from the Andes onto the fertile, well-watered agricultural land east of the mountains.

Poorly endowed with natural resources, and with populations too small to support anything but modest industry (Bolivia, the largest, has fewer than 5-million people), the countries that have been trying to go it alone are in a blind alley. Their best hopes for advancement seem to lie in merging their economies into a Latin American Common Market.

THE MACHINIST, SEPTEMBER 26, 1968

Report Card 90th Congress

Congress of Contrasts

Consumers win reforms, taxpayers still waiting

The 90th Congress has been a Congress of Contrasts.

It raised income taxes across the board, but failed to close the gaping loopholes that permit some millionaires to escape taxes entirely.

It slashed appropriations for many social and welfare programs, even while improving Social Security and launching one of the most ambitious Federal housing programs in history.

It broke a railroad strike, but went on to enact some of the most progressive consumer legislation ever.

In their report to the union's 1968 convention, IAM officers pointed out that the contrasts in performance of the 90th Congress reflect the return of the conservative coalition, made up of Republicans and Southern Democrats.

The coalition regained control, said the officers, because "too many trade union members stayed home" during the Congressional elections of 1966. As a result, "scores of labor's friends were defeated." IAM officers noted that, during the 90th Congress, the conservative coalition compelled "liberal and pro-labor forces in both parties to fight a continuing defensive battle to keep constructive programs of the Kennedy-Johnson years from being sabotaged."

In addition, said the officers, the conservative coalition seriously undermined collective bargaining when it forced 137,000 striking railmen back to their jobs and compelled them to accept a settlement dictated by compulsory arbitration."

George Nelson, the IAM's legislative representative, lists the following among the other major shortcomings of the 90th Congress:

- Failure to close tax loopholes that aid the well-to-do to escape taxes.
- Failure to raise the personal income tax exemption from its obsolete $600 level to at least $1,000.
- Failure to repeal Taft-Hartley Section 14(b), the section that encourages states to pass so-called "Right-to-Work" laws.
- Failure to update National Labor Relations Board procedures that permit unfair corporations to delay indefinitely penalties for illegal labor practices.
- Failure to establish Federal standards for job safety and for unemployment compensation.

On the positive side, Nelson cites outstanding achievements that will mark the 90th Congress as a Consumer Congress.

▸ After many years of delay, Congress passed a strong Truth-in-Lending Law. When fully effective, the law will require merchants and money lenders to explain the cost of credit in terms designed to enlighten, rather than confuse, the buyer. The law also will help protect consumers against loan sharks and will sharply limit the use of garnishments against wage earners.

▸ Disclosures of filth and contamination in meat and poultry processing plants shocked Congress into passing the Wholesome Meat and Poultry Products Acts. The laws set long-needed Federal inspection standards and assist the states in establishing sanitation standards of their own.

▸ Congress passed a landmark Housing Law designed to help millions of low-income families buy or rent homes, speed the rebuilding of our cities and even help curb land-sale swindles.

The 90th Congress also began the process of updating Social Security benefits, improved Medicare, outlawed age discrimination in employment, strengthened civil rights, approved needed raises for Federal Government employees and set up a nationwide air pollution control program.

Pressed by complaints from trade union members about cancellations and other abuses, Congress also authorized a detailed study of the entire automobile insurance industry.

Boxscores cover 10 key votes

Most trade union members will want to know how their U.S. Senators and Representatives voted on strikebreaking, aid to schools and other major questions.

Tables on the next three pages show the stands of all Senators and Congressmen on ten key votes during the 90th Congress.

These votes were carefully chosen by the IAM Legislative Department as key issues directly affecting trade union members on which this union has taken a position. Each vote reflects a clear contrast between the liberal and conservative viewpoint. The votes show that there are liberals and conservatives in both parties.

The ten votes in the House and ten in the Senate are, of course, only a small sample of the total cast. However, because they are key votes on important issues, they give union members a picture of the general position of their legislators.

As in the past, some Senators and Congressmen will complain that the vote selected for this boxscore was not the final vote on the issue. Often, a legislator will vote to send a measure back to committee—in effect kill it—and, when that fails, reverse himself to vote for the bill on final passage. Obviously, in such a case, the final vote is not the key vote.

Over the years, some readers have questioned the use in these tables of "R" and "W" symbols for "Right" and "Wrong" as seen from labor's point of view, instead of simple "Yes" and "No."

The problem is that a "Yes" vote is sometimes cast on a motion to defeat a bill; while a "No" vote may save a bill from crippling amendment.

"R" and "W" symbols give union members quick keys to where a legislator stood in relation to labor's position on ten major issues decided by the 90th Congress.

How your Representa

The table here shows how every Congressman voted on the key issues during the 90th Congress. Selected by the IAM Legislative Department, the ten significant votes are described below. The numbers correspond to those at the top of each column. To check your Congressman, find your state. His name is preceded by the number of your Congressional District. For simplicity, the symbols "R" for "Right" and "W" for "Wrong" from labor's viewpoint are used. Add up your Congressman's "R" votes to figure his average.

1. Strikebreaking—Congress passed a strikebreaking bill forcing 137,000 striking rail shopmen back to work and requiring them to accept a compulsory arbitration settlement. The House originally refused to include the compulsory arbitration feature, then gave in when the Senate insisted. The vote on the motion of Rep. Samuel Friedel of Maryland to include compulsory arbitration was 244-148, July 17, 1967. A vote against the Friedel motion was a Right "R" vote.

2. 21-Day Rule—In the highly effective 89th Congress (1965-66), the House had the so-called 21-day rule. This prevented the powerful Rules Committee from holding up a committee-approved bill for more than 21 days before scheduling it for a vote on the floor. At the start of the 90th Congress, Rep. Carl Albert of Oklahoma moved to continue the 21-day rule. A coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans defeated the motion 224-197, Jan. 10, 1967. A vote for continuing the 21-day rule was a Right "R" vote.

3. Better Schools—The nation's Federal aid to education program, a landmark 1965 Congressional achievement, provided that Federal funds would go directly to school districts, with the neediest receiving the most. In 1967, aided by states' rights sentiment, Rep. Edith Green of Oregon won House approval of her plan to funnel $500,000,000 for supplementary educational centers to state education departments rather than directly to school districts. Her amendment carried 230-185, May 24, 1967. A Right "R" vote was a vote against the Green amendment.

4. Food Stamps—The successful food stamp program which helps low-income families buy decent food at neighborhood stores weathered a storm in the House. An Agriculture Committee amendment called for states to bear 20 per cent of the cost. Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan of Missouri argued this would force some of the poorer states to drop the program. The amendment was defeated 194-173, June 8, 1967. A vote against was a Right "R" vote.

5. Rat Control—Conservative Congressmen poked fun at a $40,000,000 Johnson Administration program for grants to localities to fight rats. The bill was denied even an airing on the floor by a 207-176 vote July 20, 1967. A vote to bring the bill out for debate was a Right "R" vote.

6. Federal Pay Raise—House Post Office and Civil Service Committee called for three-step raises over three years for all Federal and postal employees to bring them up to private pay levels. Rep. H. R. Gross of Iowa moved Oct. 11, 1967 to cut all but the first year increase (6 per cent, postal; 4.5 per cent for other employees). Gross motion was defeated 211-199. A vote against was a Right "R" vote.

7. Taxes-Budget Cuts—Congress coupled a 10 per cent income tax surcharge with a requirement that the Federal budget be trimmed by six billion dollars. Fearing that so big a budget reduction would endanger vital federal programs, liberals in the House appealed for a lesser cut in the budget. Their motion, presented by Rep. James Burke of Massachusetts, was rejected 259-137, May 29, 1968. A vote for the Burke motion was a Right "R" vote.

8. Meat Inspection—Passage of a strong meat inspection law followed revelation of shocking conditions of filth and contamination in many uninspected plants. Earlier, the House had rejected a motion by Rep. Neal Smith of Iowa to require intrastate meat plants to meet federal inspection standards. The 207-166 vote against the Smith motion came on Nov. 29, 1967. A vote for the Smith proposal was a Right "R" vote.

9. Civil Rights—The Civil Rights Act of 1968 bans discrimination in housing, protects civil rights workers and prohibits interstate travel with the intent to riot. A key vote in the House came April 10, 1968 on a motion by Rep. Ray Madden of Indiana to permit House acceptance of Senate amendments to the House bill. The motion was approved 229-195. A vote for the motion was a Right "R" vote.

10. Housing—The landmark housing law passed this year provides interest subsidies to help low income families buy homes and incentived for apartment builders to provide low-rent units. The House approved the bill 295-114, July 10, 1968. A vote for the bill was a Right "R" vote.

How your Senators voted

The voting table here is designed as a yardstick to help union members figure how well their two U.S. Senators represented them in the 90th Congress.

The table shows how every Senator voted on 10 key issues on which labor took a stand. The key issues were chosen by the IAM Legislative Department. Senators recorded as not voting frequently announced their positions, but these had no influence on the outcome and hence were not tabulated.

Each vote is explained in the numbered list below. The numbers corresponding to the explanations of the votes appear at the top of the columns at the right. To simplify, the symbols "R" and "W" are used. "R" indicates a Right vote and "W" a Wrong vote in terms of the IAM's position.

Key to Symbols

R Voted Right or was paired Right from labor's viewpoint.

W Voted Wrong or was paired Wrong from labor's viewpoint.

O Did not vote.

Name in italic—Seat up for election Nov. 5, 1968

1. Strikebreaking—Congress passed a strikebreaking bill by U.S. Sen. Wayne Morse of Oregon that forced 137,000 striking railroad shopmen to return to work and accept a compulsory arbitration settlement. Prior to Senate passage, Sen. Ralph Yarborough of Texas proposed that the Government impound 10 per cent of railroads' profits until they settled with the unions. This was defeated 59-23, June 7, 1967. A vote for the Yarborough amendment was a Right "R" vote.

2. Anti-Filibuster Rule—To halt filibusters, endless talk to prevent passage of a bill, a Senate rules change was proposed. Filibuster would be brought to an end by a three-fifths vote of those present, instead of two-thirds as now. Motion of Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana to end debate (invoke cloture) failed 53-46, Jan. 24, 1967, for lack of required two-thirds majority. A vote for Mansfield's motion was a Right "R" vote.

3. One Man, One Vote—A House-passed bill would have permitted population variations of up to 35 per cent in House districts for the 1968 and 1970 elections, with 10 per cent thereafter. In Senate, Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts called for immediate application of the 10 per cent limit. Kennedy amendment carried 44-39, June 8, 1967. A Right "R" vote was a vote for Kennedy's "one man, one vote" amendment.

4. Campaign funds—Sen. John Williams of Delaware proposed that unions be prohibited from maintaining organizations, like the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League, to seek members' voluntary contributions for use in national elections. Unions have no other way to raise campaign funds since the law already prohibits political contributions to federal candidates from union treasuries. Williams' loaded proposal was defeated 19-46, Sept. 11, 1967. A Right "R" vote was a vote against the anti-union measure.

5. Rent Supplements—Congress cut President Johnson's request for the successful rent supplement program from $40,000,000 down to $10,000,000. The plan aids low-income families for whom public housing is not available. In an early attack Sen. Frank Lausche attempted to cut the proposed $40,000,000 in half. Lausche was defeated 34-55, Sept. 20, 1967. A vote against the Lausche cut was a Right "R" vote. Subsequently, House conservatives succeeded in slashing the figure to $10,000,000.

6. Emergency Jobs—The Senate Labor Committee recommended a two-year emergency program to employ 200,000 of the hard-core jobless on useful anti-poverty projects. The Senate turned down the plan, rejecting even a bi-partisan compromise proposal to salvage part of the program. The compromise plan, introduced by Sen. Winston Prouty of Vermont, was defeated 47-42, Oct. 4, 1967. A vote for the Prouty proposal was a Right "R" vote.

7. Social Security—The conservative coalition's attempt to cut Social Security benefit increases was defeated. The Senate bill provided for a 15 per cent across-the-board raise with a minimum monthly benefit of $70. Sen. Carl Curtis of Nebraska attempted to cut this back to the level of the House-passed bill, 12½ per cent with a $50 monthly minimum. Curtis' amendment failed 58-22, Nov. 21, 1967. A Right "R" vote was a vote against the Curtis cut.

8. Better Schools—The landmark school aid law passed by Congress in 1965 provided that federal funds would go directly to local school districts. In 1967, Congress renewed this law but undermined key parts under the guise of "states rights." One amendment to transfer control of funds to state boards of education was offered in the Senate by Strom Thurmond of South Carolina. The amendment was rejected 38-35, Dec. 11, 1967. A vote against the amendment was a Right "R" vote.

9. Civil Rights—A coalition of Dixiecrats and conservative Republicans again tried to prevent civil rights legislation from coming to a vote. A cloture motion, requiring two-thirds of those present, finally succeeded in ending debate on March 4, 1968. The vote was 65-32. A vote for the motion was a Right "R" vote.

10. Runaway Shops—The tax exemption on interest from industrial development bonds has become a subsidy that has encouraged industrial plants to run out on their employees. An amendment by Sen. Abe Ribicoff of Connecticut to end this tax exemption passed the Senate 50-32, March 28, 1968. A vote for the amendment was a Right "R" vote.

FCNL WASHINGTON NEWSLETTER

FRIENDS COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION
245 2ND STREET, N.E. WASHINGTON, D. C. 20002

No. 296 AUGUST-SEPTEMBER 1968

REVIEW AND VOTING RECORD: THE 1968 SESSION OF CONGRESS

In order to help citizens prepare for the election campaigns, this Newsletter attempts to summarize major Congressional debates and votes up to the August recess. Unfortunately, some very important decisions are taken by voice votes, which are not recorded. You may wish to explore these issues further with your local nominees for Congress.

Summary: The second session of the 90th Congress was buffetted by an accumulation of painful events and problems: the tragic assassination of two of the nation's leaders, city riots, the Kerner Commission's charge that the "nation is moving toward two societies, one black, one white," the Poor Peoples Campaign, increased disruption of the economy and the Federal budget by the war in Asia and the intensification of that war despite negotiations in Paris. Congressional responses were emotional and largely inadequate, partly because 1968 is an election year, and many Congressmen have been out campaigning in their districts, partly because of a lack of leadership intensified by President Johnson's decision to withdraw from politics, and partly because of a hesitancy to give up old responses and look for new solutions.

The failure of militaristic responses did not deter Congress from continuing to appropriate astronomical sums for war, miniscule sums for peace. Efforts to combat crime and insure safe streets centered largely on repressive measures instead of ways of improving justice and increasing opportunities for the poor.

Although a number of Congressmen emphasized the importance of re-ordering U.S. priorities to meet human needs at home and abroad, members as a whole preferred to offset pressures on the economy through a $6 billion cutback in fiscal 1969 expenditures (see S vote 2; H vote 2). This cutback would tend to be concentrated in domestic and international development programs, since the Vietnamese war was exempted from the reduction requirement. Efforts to redirect or restrict the economy drive and make the President's 10% surtax less of a war tax were rejected by both Houses. An amendment by Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., to concentrate the $6 billion cut in military assistance, the space program, and military expenditures was defeated, 17-62 (see S vote 8).

Reduction of Tensions

Support for the UN: Since the United States embarked on unilateralism back in 1961, there has been less and less Congressional discussion of the United Nations. The President did go to the UN over the Pueblo incident but only after calling up 15,000 reserves and concentrating a naval task force in the Sea of Japan. He later asked for more military aid to Korea, which Congress promptly appropriated. A Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee did hold hearings on a resolution encouraging support for a permanent UN peacekeeping force. And at the request of Sen. Mike Monroney, Okla., the Senate agreed to transfer $5 million from military aid activities to the UN Development Fund. Sen. Monroney pointed out to his colleagues that the cut in military aid "would be less than the cost of one jet fighter, and I think this amount . . . invested in the basic development in the poorest countries . . . is better spent." Unfortunately this $5 million addition was more than offset by a simultaneous agreement to cut overall contributions to UN relief and development activities by $13 million or 10%.

No action has yet been taken on five UN Human Rights Conventions which have been before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for a number of years. These cover the Political Rights of Women, Forced Labor, Genocide, Freedom of Association and Discrimination in Employment.

Vietnam: Before President Johnson announced his decision to retire from politics and to begin negotiations with Hanoi, leading Congressmen were extremely vocal in criticizing U.S. policy in Southeast Asia. The Pueblo incident, the Tet offensive and talk of increasing U.S. troop strength in South Vietnam another 200,000 intensified Congressional frustration.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee carried on a running dispute with the Executive Branch. It questioned the alleged 1964 attacks in the Gulf of Tonkin and forced Secretary of State Dean Rusk to make his first public testimony on the war in two years. In January, Sens. John Cooper, Ky., and Mike Mansfield, Mont., led an effort to bring about a halt in the bombing of North Vietnam. Sens. Mark Hatfield, Oreg., Stephen Young, Ohio, and Vance Hartke, Ind., offered a resolution specifying that any extension of the war beyond South Vietnam would require the full consent of Congress. Fears of further escalation prompted a heated debate on March 7 led by Sen. J. W. Fulbright, Ark. At that time Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., warned that, "Vietnam is a cancer which is devouring our youth, our morals, our national wealth, and the energies of our leadership."

In the House, 143 Congressmen joined Rep. Paul Findley, Ill., and William Hungate, Mo., in calling upon the "appropriate" Congressional committees to decide whether or not further Congressional action was desirable in respect to policy in South Vietnam. However, more strongly worded resolutions, introduced by Reps. William Moorhead, Pa., and Lester Wolff, N. Y., to repeal the August 10 Gulf of Tonkin Resolution and to stop further military escalation drew only 18 and 22 supporters, respectively. In March, a joint statement calling for acceptance of Viet Cong participation in the selection of a new government was signed by Reps. Bingham, N. Y.; Blatnik, Minn.; Boland, Mass.; Farbstein, N. Y.; Fraser, Minn.; Hicks, Wash.; Jacobs, Jr., Ind.; Karth, Minn.; Kastenmeier, Wis.; Leggett, Calif.; Moss, Calif.; O'Neill, Mass.; Ottinger, N. Y.; Rees, Calif.; Reuss, Wis.; Scheuer, N. Y.; Tenzer, N. Y.; and Yates, Ill.

Since the beginning of negotiations in May most Congressmen have been afraid to question or oppose U.S. policy on the off chance that their actions might impede a settlement. When the $6 billion supplemental budget for Southeast Asia for fiscal 1968 was debated in June, Senators turned down Sen. William Proxmire's, Wis., amendment to delete $268 million for increased B-52 bombing raids. The amendment was defeated, 10-79 on the grounds that expanded bombing by the United States is not escalation but a defensive response to Viet Cong attacks (see S vote 1). Only Sens. Wayne Morse, Oreg., and Gaylord Nelson, Wis., voted against the entire supplemental. The same bill prompted only mild discussion in the House, partly because the supplemental funds for Vietnam were incorporated in a bill carrying monies for domestic welfare agencies. Yet Rep. Charles Mosher, Ohio, warned that ". . . Vietnam seems an endless, bottomless pit into which we wrongly are dumping our resources, bankrupting ourselves in so many, many ways." Rep. John Dow's, N. Y., amendment to strike all funds for Southeast Asia received only 4 votes. Thirty-three members voted against the entire bill (see H vote 1).

In a more recent development, Rep. William Ryan, N. Y., and 11 others signed a statement in August reaffirming opposition to Administration policy. They called for "A total and permanent end to the bombing of North Vietnam. . . . A cessation of offensive search and destroy missions and the bombing of populated areas in South Vietnam while the negotiations are progressing. . . . An acceptance of NLF direct participation in negotiations and their right to participate in the future political life of South Vietnam." Signers included Reps. Brown, Calif.; Burton, Calif.; Conyers, Mich.; Dow, N. Y.; Edwards, Calif.; Fraser, Minn.; Helstoski, N. J.; Kastenmeier, Wis.; Rosenthal, N. Y.; Roybal, Calif.; and Ryan, N. Y.

Relations with Communist Areas: At the beginning of the session leading Senators, such as Sens. Mansfield, Mont., Church, Idaho, Morton, Ky., and Percy, Ill., expressed dissatisfaction with a foreign policy based on cold war dogma. Yet Congress continued and expanded economic restrictions designed to "encourage" other nations to support U.S. anti-communism. A bill continuing the Export-Import Bank 5 years would prohibit extension of credit for purchase of U.S. goods to (1) communist countries or to third parties in other countries who pass the goods on to communist nations or (2) any nation which trades with North Vietnam. Restrictions on concessional sales of agricultural commodities to communist nations were also continued. However, the Senate did reject an attempt by Sens. Karl Mundt, S. Dak., and Harry Byrd, Jr., Va., to impose a 20% surtax on taxpayers trading with communist countries supplying North Vietnam (see S vote 4).

Throughout the session, Sen. Walter Mondale, Minn., took the lead in trying to improve the climate for expanded trade with Eastern Europe. Yet, because of the war, the Administration did not resubmit its 1966 proposal to end the extra high tariff barriers against communist goods.

Disarmament: The Senate is expected to recommend ratification of the treaty to end proliferation of nuclear weapons upon its return in September. Although many Congressmen have hailed the treaty as a great step forward, a number are demanding assurance that the agreement does not involve any "concessions" by the United States. Anti-ballistic missile proponents are particularly concerned that the treaty not inhibit development of "defensive" weaponry.

This suspicion of disarmament matters has been underlined by continued refusal to provide full funding of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, partly because of its involvement in negotiating the nonproliferation treaty. The Administration had asked for a 3-year, $33 million extension, but the Senate and House compromised on a 2-year, $18.5 million extension (see S vote 3; H vote 3).

The Human Family

Development Aid: Foreign aid continued to be the whipping boy for Congressional frustration over the war and domestic unrest. Little interest was shown in either the needs of the developing peoples or in the inadequacy of the U.S. assistance effort. In fact, some members proposed a year's "moratorium" on aid in hopes of helping ease the war-induced balance of payments deficit. During House debate, Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal, N. Y., observed, "In a decade where we count military expenditures by the billions and war casualties by the tens of thousands, Congress remains intent upon measuring our foreign aid drop by drop. . . ."

House and Senate conferees have tentatively agreed to place a $1.1 billion ceiling on economic aid in fiscal 1969. This is the smallest economic aid bill in 20 years. It is $663 million or 37% below the $1.8 billion requested by the Administration (see H vote 5). In a meat-cleaver swing Congress lowered the proposed budget for development lending by 54% to $350 million and cut Alliance for Progress funds 33% to $420 million. Interest rates were raised as well. An attempt by Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., to restore $317.6 million requested for development loans and contributions to international agencies was heavily defeated (see S vote 5).

Multilateral Aid: Congressmen who oppose bilateral U.S. aid as a step toward military involvement seem equally disinclined to support additional contributions to multilateral organizations. This is due in part to concern over the balance of payments, although the Administration has specified that most contributions to multilateral agencies will be spent in the United States. This year Congress did agree to authorize another $412 million contribution over 2 years to help expand the callable capital stock of the Inter-American Development Bank—the arm of the Alliance for Progress (see H vote 4).

No action has been taken on Administration requests for $200 million to help open a soft-loan window in the Asian Development Bank or for $480 million to help replenish the resources of the International Development Association. IDA which serves as a long-term low-interest rate affiliate of the World Bank, has been out of funds since February. Deferment of payment by the United States is holding up new lending agreements with India and Pakistan.

Trade: Although the Administration has asked Congress to extend the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, no recommendations have been offered to increase access to the American market for goods from developing countries. In fact, many Congressmen have been clamouring for increased protection for U.S. products.

Food for Peace: Congress turned down the Administration's request for a 3-year extension of PL 480 but raised no question about continuing the current $2.5 billion annual ceiling on expenditures, largely because the Administration has been spending less than 50% of the authorized amount (see H vote 6). Certain creative projects, such as an accelerated agricultural technical assistance program authorized in 1966, have never been funded.

The compromise 2-year extension encourages greater use of PL 480 sales proceeds for population control and educational activities and authorizes the use of up to 50% of local currencies generated under the Act to pay for regular imports from food deficit areas. This could mean that the developing world would earn fewer dollars with which to buy needed machinery and agricultural supplies.

What price ABM?

During debate on the military construction bill Rep. Henry Reuss, Wis., argued that, "I am deeply disturbed by the $263.3 million contained in this bill for deployment of the Sentinel ABM system. Our cities are smoldering with frustration and unrest, our air is not fit to breathe nor our water to drink, inflation is gnawing at our economy, yet we are about to plunk down $5 to $40 billion for the illusory security of a maginot line."

Rep. Andrew Jacobs, Ind.: "What has happened to us . . ." when we cannot "even get a whisper in this House" in support of a $2.1 billion program to aid disadvantaged preschool children? "But on a day when we are talking about escalating by $40 billion the already . . . topheavy defense budget" no one is expected to question "whether the new gadget would work—or even if it did, whether we can afford it."—July 29, House floor.

Military Policy

Military Costs: Since the $81.8 billion requested for military activities in fiscal 1969 constituted 60% of the total Federal budget request, a few more Congressmen began to feel that the military establishment has developed a momentum of its own which has little relevance to basic U.S. goals and needs. "The poor," said Rep. George Brown, Calif., "can no longer understand why a country that can spend $80 billion on 'defense' cannot spend the $8 billion more required to wipe out poverty." In reaction to this feeling, Congressmen began to wrestle with the need to curb Department of Defense spending. Major opposition centered on budget requests for additional millions to implement last year's decision to build a "thin" $5 billion anti-ballistic system to counter China's nuclear capabilities in the 1970's.

The struggle over ABM was particularly intense in the Senate where a series of amendments were offered by Sens. Nelson, Wis., Cooper, Ky., Hart, Mich., and Young, Ohio, to eliminate or postpone initial construction (see S vote 6). Administration supporters were able to defeat these proposals by arguing that deployment would not only meet any Chinese threat, it would also save millions of lives during a Soviet attack. Somewhat comparable amendments to eliminate ABM procurement and construction were offered in the House by Reps. Jeffery Cohelan, Calif., and Robert Leggett, Calif. These were rejected by standing votes of 37-106; 40-147.

When the $22 billion research and procurement budget was under discussion, the Senate turned down, 12-44, Sen. Joseph Clark's Pa., call for a $2 billion cut, but agreed 45-13 to a $660 million cut proposed by Sen. John Williams, Del. Voting against the measure were Sens. Gruening, Alaska, Mansfield, Mont., and Nelson, Wis., and 15 House members (see H vote 7). During House debate, an attempt by Rep. Tom Railsback, Ill., to cut $300 million from the bill was defeated 71-133.

Thirty-two House members (see H vote 8) and Sens. Young, Ohio, Morse, Oreg., and Nelson, Wis., opposed the $1.8 billion military construction program.

There has been some discussion by Sens. Mike Mansfield, Mont., and Stuart Symington, Mo., of trying to prune U.S. troop strength in Europe. This may come up when the omnibus $72-$77 billion Department of Defense appropriation bill is brought to the floor in September.

During an unsuccessful appeal for a 17% cut in the $64 million civil defense budget, Sen. Stephen Young, Ohio, argued that the U.S. might better spend the money to "cure social evils . . . at home and to forge links of peace . . . throughout the world." (see S vote 7)

The Draft: Although the draft continues to interfere with domestic practices and the lives of many young men—over 26% of the men fighting in Vietnam are draftees—the House and Senate Armed Services Committees have not acted on proposals to reform the Selective Service System. Sens. Hugh Scott, Pa., George McGovern, S. Dak., and Stephen Young, Ohio, plan to offer legislation either in September or next year to replace the draft with a voluntary system.

Military Aid: The 1967 battle over shipment of military equipment to developing countries has continued on a more subdued level this year. In July, the House Foreign Affairs Committee approved the Administration's request for $296 million to help finance credit sales of defense articles to the developing world in fiscal 1969. The bill is still pending before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The DOD budget contains another $1.97 billion for "support of Free World Forces" in Southeast Asia. Another $375 million of military grant aid is carried in the foreign assistance bill largely for Turkey, Iran, Taiwan and South Korea. Many Congressmen who have expressed concern over these programs are encouraging the Administration to sell jet fighters to Israel.

Human Rights at Home

Equal Rights: In the early months of the session the Senate was preoccupied with a long, drawn out debate over open housing. The 6 week deadlock ended March 4 after 4 cloture votes (see S vote 9). The final cloture vote cleared the way for Senate passage, 71-20, on March 11. This omnibus bill would prohibit discrimination in the sale or rental of 80% of all housing; protect persons against interference in exercising their civil rights; extend Constitutional rights to Indians and penalize riot leaders. The House accepted the Senate version on April 10 (see H vote 9).

Efforts to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission were unsuccessful. An Administration bill giving the EEOC power to issue cease and desist orders against discriminating employers and unions has not reached the floor. The budget for the EEOC was cut one third.

The House Appropriations Committee, led by Rep. Jamie Whitten, Miss., added provisions to the Health, Education and Welfare bill which would prohibit the use of funds to force the busing of students or other activities intended to promote school integration. An attempt by Rep. Jeffrey Cohelan, Calif., to delete these provisions was defeated 75-116.

Adequate Housing: Enactment of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 is the nearest Congress came in fulfilling the recommendations of the Kerner Report on Civil Disorders. The $5.3 billion, 3-year program is designed to provide over 1.7 million units of new and rehabilitated housing for low-income families. (The Kerner Commission had recommended 6 million units over the next 5 years; the Administration had requested a $7.5 billion, 5-year program.) In addition the bill would encourage home-ownership for low-income families, extend and expand existing public housing; rent supplement, urban redevelopment and Model Cities programs. Only Sens. Holland, Fla., Russell, Ga., Stennis, Miss., and Thurmond, S. C., opposed the bill. The House passed the measure on July 10, 295-114.

An attempt by Sen. Gordon Allott, Colo., to cut the $1 billion fiscal 1969 appropriations for Model Cities was rejected 21-54 (see S vote 10).

Employment: House and Senate Labor Committees have approved legislation extending the Manpower and Development Training Act another 4 years, placing increased emphasis on training the unskilled. However, the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee has not yet approved an employment opportunities bill recommended by the Subcommittee on Select Labor, which would provide 2.4 million jobs at a cost of $10.3 billion over 4 years. The Kerner Commission has urged the creation of 2 million jobs in 3 years as an important step in overcoming poverty.

Hunger: The Poor Peoples Campaign sharpened Congressional awareness of the need for improvement in food programs for many malnourished Americans. The House on July 30 voted 227-172 in favor of Rep. Leonor Sullivan's, Mo., amendment which would remove the ceiling on expenditures under the Food Stamp Program for 4 years (see H vote 11). The Senate had approved a $245 million ceiling. A final decision will be reached in September.

Earlier, Sen. Philip Hart, Mich., led a successful effort to overturn the Senate Agriculture Committee's decision to restrict feeding programs for disadvantaged children (see S vote 11). The House had approved, 398-0 an expanded program on March 5. The Senate Agriculture Committee reported an "emergency" House-passed bill (H.R. 17872) which would authorize the use of another $100 million annually over the next 3 years to help states provide free meals to needy children. In the Senate, a modified version of H.R. 17872 offered by Sen Allen Ellender, La., would provide only $50 million annually over the next 2 years. It was accepted 57-31, July 17.

OEO: In an economy move the House cut $650 million from the $15.2 billion requested for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare for fiscal 1969. The $2.2 billion Office of Economic Opportunity budget was cut $307 million. An attempt by Rep. William Scherle, Iowa, to reduce the OEO budget another $100 million was defeated 181-220 (see H vote 10). The Senate will act on these requests in September.

A more imaginative approach to the problems of poverty is incorporated in the Community Self-Determination Act (S. 3875) introduced recently by Sens. Nelson, Wis., Harris, Okla., Percy, Ill., and 27 others.

Welfare: Efforts throughout this session to repeal the 1967 freeze on the number of children eligible to receive welfare within each state resulted in a one year postponement of the restriction. Rep. William Ryan, N. Y., has introduced a bill (H.R. 17331) which would provide for a minimal income maintenance system tied closely with work incentives. There have been no other major proposals to revise the welfare system or to provide a guaranteed annual income.

Civil Liberties

The struggle to maintain the constitutional rights of individuals suffered a serious setback with passage of a heavily amended Crime Control and Safe Streets bill. The Senate added two titles which would infringe upon the rights to privacy, to counsel and not to incriminate oneself. Title II of the bill would overrule Supreme Court efforts to protect the rights of suspects by countenancing forced confessions, and by long delays between arrest and judical review.

SOME KEY VOTES OF SENATORS IN 1968*

1. Amendment by Sens. William Proxmire, Wis., and George McGovern, S. Dak., to eliminate $268 million requested by the Administration to increase B-52 bombing raids in Vietnam. Rejected 10-79 (R 2-34; D 8-45), June 26.
2. Effort by Sens. John Williams, Del., and George Smathers, Fla., to raise taxes and cut domestic programs through a 10% surtax and a $6 billion cutback in fiscal 1969 spending. Expenditures for the Vietnam war, interest on the Federal debt, and veterans and Social Security benefits were exempted from the reduction requirement. Accepted 53-35 (R 31-3; D 22-32), April 2.
3. Attempt by Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., to gain approval of a three year, $33 million extension of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, as requested by the Administration. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee had approved a two year, $17 million extension. Sen. Clark's amendment rejected 18-53 (R 2-26; D 16-27), April 22.
4. Effort by Sens. Karl Mundt, S. Dak., and Harry Byrd, Jr., Va., to impose a 20% surtax on those trading with Communist nations supplying North Vietnam. Rejected 38-44 (R 16-16; D 22-28), March 28.
5. Attempt by Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., to restore $317.6 million to Development Loan Fund, Alliance for Progress, Contributions to International Organizations and other AID activities. Rejected 13-62 (R 2-21; D 11-41), July 31.
6. Attempt by Sens. John S. Cooper, Ky., and Philip Hart, Mich., to postpone initial construction of the Anti-Ballistic-Missile System for one year. Some $227.3 million had been requested for requisition of sites and facilities in fiscal 1969. Amendment rejected 34-52 (R 12-23; D 22-29), June 24.
7. Amendment by Sen. Stephen Young, Ohio, to cut the $63.6 million civil defense budget, approved by the Senate Appropriations Committee, by $10.6 million. Rejected 27-54 (R 6-25; D 21-29), July 18.
8. Effort by Sen. Joseph Clark, Pa., to require that the $6 billion of spending cuts imposed by Congress on the overall fiscal 1969 budget be concentrated in foreign military assistance, the space program, and Department of Defense expenditures. Rejected 17-62 (R 1-30; D 16-32), March 29.
9. Motion by Sen. Mike Mansfield, Mont., to end the filibuster on the civil rights bill and allow the Senate to vote on open-housing amendments. This was the fourth and final cloture vote on the civil rights bill. Accepted 65-32 (R 24-12; D 41-20), March 4.
10. Attempt by Sen. Gordon Allott, Colo., to reduce fiscal 1969 grants for Model Cities from the $1 billion requested by the Administration to $750 million and to reduce funds for urban renewal in model cities projects from $500 million to $375 million. Rejected 21-54 (R 14-14; D 7-40), July 18.
11. Effort by Sen. Philip Hart, Mich., to insure passage of a House passed bill which would extend feeding programs to underprivileged children in child care institutions and continue the pilot breakfast program another three years. The Senate Agriculture Committee had deleted the child care program and limited the breakfast program to two years. Sen. Hart's effort accepted 38-14 (R 8-6; D 30-8), April 17.
12. Amendment by Sen. Joseph Tydings, Md., to strike provisions of the Crime Control and Safe Streets Bill which would overrule Supreme Court efforts to protect the rights of suspects to counsel and to silence. Rejected 31-51 (R 7-24; D 24-27), May 21.
13. Attempt by Sen. Edward Long, Mo., to delete wiretapping provisions of the Crime Control and Safe Streets Bill. Rejected 12-68 (R 3-29; D 9-39), May 23.
14. Amendment by Sen. Edward Kennedy, Mass., to prohibit interstate mail-order sales of rifles and shotguns. Rejected 29-53 (R 9-22; D 20-31), May 16.
15. Effort by Sen. Edward Long, Mo., to permit prospective draftees to have a lawyer in appearances before local Selective Service boards. Rejected 18-63 (R 5-29; D 13-34), May 22.

SOME KEY VOTES OF REPRESENTATIVES IN 1968*

1. Approval of the President's request for another $6 billion for the war in Vietnam for the year ending June 30, 1968. This raised the total Vietnam budget for fiscal 1968 to $27 billion. Passed 324-33 (R 143-18; D 181-15), June 11.
2. Passage of a bill providing for a 10% surtax on income and a $6 billion cutback in proposed federal spending for fiscal 1969. Expenditures for the Vietnam war, interest on the Federal Debt, and veterans and Social Security benefits were exempted from the reduction requirements. Passed 268-150 (R 114-73; D 154-77), June 20.
3. Effort by Rep. Edward Derwinski, Ill., to limit extension of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency to two years at a cost of $20 million. The Administration had requested a three year, $33 million bill. Rep. Derwinski's amendment accepted 241-162 (R 171-7; D 70-155), March 6.
4. Effort by Rep. Thomas Curtis, Mo., to kill a bill authorizing an additional $412 million contribution over the next two years to help expand the callable capital of the Inter-American Development Bank. Rejected 126-271 (R 75-97; D 51-174), March 19.
5. Attempt by Rep. Ross Adair, Ill., to cut an additional $75 million from the Alliance for Progress, $13 million from Contributions to International Organizations and $77 million from other AID activities. Accepted 268-150 (R 164-20; D 104-130), July 18.
6. Passage of a bill extending the Food for Peace Act for one year. Approved 346-42 (R 152-25; D 194-17), May 14.
7. Passage of a bill setting a $21.6 billion ceiling on military research and development and procurement of aircraft, vessels and missiles for fiscal 1969. Another $55 to $60 billion of military funding is carried in other bills. Passed 363-15 (R 162-2; D 201-13), July 11.
8. Attempt by Rep. Robert Michel, Ill., to kill the $1.8 billion Military Construction bill. Rejected 32-350 (R 8-153; D 24-197), July 29.
9. Motion by Rep. Ray Madden, Ind. to accept the Senate version of the civil rights bill which included open-housing amendments. Accepted 229-195 (R 77-106; D 152-89), April 10.
10. Effort by Rep. William Scherle, Iowa, to cut $100 million from the $1.87 billion budget approved by the Appropriations Committee for the Office of Economic Opportunity for fiscal 1969. The Administration had requested $2.18 billion. Amendment rejected 181-220 (R 110-64; D 71-156), June 26.
11. Attempt by Rep. Leonor Sullivan, Mo., to eliminate the ceiling on expenditures for the Food Stamp Program. This would give the Government authority to sell as many stamps as the poor could afford. Accepted 227-172 (R 32-138; D 195-34), July 30.
12. Attempt by Rep. Clark MacGregor, Minn., to eliminate restrictions on the sale of ammunition for shotguns and rifles. Accepted 218-205 (R 116-70; D 102-135), July 24.
13. Motion by Rep. B. F. Sisk, Calif., to accept the Senate version of the Crime Control and Safe Streets bill, thus forclosing any possibility of modifying Senate language authorizing wiretapping and infringing upon the rights of suspects. Accepted 349-40 (R 169-6; D 180-34), June 6.

*The "yes" votes in the tabulation include all those on record as favoring an action, whether they actually voted on the floor or not. The "no" votes includ all those on record as opposing an action. (Thus the totals of any one column may exceed the totals in the text which include recorded votes only.) A "?' designates those who were absent, or whose position was not known. A blank means the seat is vacant, or was occupied by a different incumbent at th time of the vote.

Bold type "Y" and "N" indicates positions preferred by FCNL, i.e.: As expressed in 1968 Statement of Legislative Policy, Testimony, etc.

Elected to the House in a special election, March 18.

Who is helping Whom?

According to a House Committee on Government Operations report, it cost the developing world at least $150 million to educate the 7913 scientists, engineers, and physicians who migrated to the United States in 1967. The number of physicians equalled the 1967 output of the 15 largest U.S. medical schools. Witnesses before the Committee warned that if the United States and other advanced countries continue to encourage this scientific brain drain, the developing world will suffer serious long-term consequences—a delay in reforming ill-adapted educational systems, a kind of contagious outward movement, an undermining of the sense of worth of those who remain, and a decimation of the relatively small cadre of leadership personnel.

Sen Joseph D. Tydings', Md., attempt to eliminate this provision was defeated 31-51 (see S vote 12). Title III authorizes Federal and state wiretapping and electronic surveillance in a wide variety of criminal investigations. Sen. Edward Long's, Mo., effort to delete this was defeated 12-68 (see S vote 13). Sen. Long also offered an amendment to permit prospective draftees to have a lawyer while appearing before his local Selective Service Board. This was defeated 18-63 (see S vote 15). The only Senators to vote against the omnibus bill were Sens. Fong, Hawaii, Cooper, Ky., Metcalf, Mont., and Hart, Mich. Because of the assassination of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, N. Y., and the increased concern over crime, the House accepted the Senate version without change (see H vote 13).

HUAC Budget: The House on March 13 agreed to give the House Un-American Activities Committee $375 thousand for investigation expenditures in 1968, $25 thousand more than the Committee received in 1967. Still awaiting action is the omnibus Internal Security Act of 1968, and the controversial "Pool Bill" (H.R. 8) which would stiffen penalties for people soliciting or sending medical supplies to North Vietnam.

Capital Punishment: The Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on Sen. Philip Hart's Mich., bill to abolish capital punishment. These were the first formal Senate hearings in history to consider ending the death penalty. No further action has been taken on the bill, or on similar proposals on the House side.

Other Issues

Gun Control: Prohibitions against interstate mail-order and over-the-counter sales of hand guns to out of state purchasers were included in the Crime Control and Safe Streets bill. However, Sen. Edward Kennedy's, Mass., amendment to include rifles and shotguns under the restriction was rejected 29-53 (see S vote 14). After much public outcry, the House passed another bill to extend the restrictions on interstate sales to rifles and shotguns but refused to approve registration or licensing of firearms or restrictions on the sale of ammunition for long guns (see H vote 12). Legislation concerning sales, licensing and registering of firearms is presently stalled in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ethical standards: This year Congress approved new rules of ethics to govern Congressional financial activities, but rejected Sen. Joseph Clark's, Pa., and Sen. Clifford Case's, N. J., effort to require full public disclosure of nearly all aspects of a Senator's or Senatorial employee's financial status. The Clark-Case amendment was defeated 40-44.

HHH upswing appears in final drive

The Humphrey-Nixon campaign is an unpredictable horse race right down to the wire.

This is the estimate of public opinion analyst Louis Bean. He has never missed on the outcome of a Presidential campaign, including 1948 when almost all other pollsters were wrong. He also called Kennedy's narrow victory in 1960.

About the same time Bean made public his 1968 observations, two other top pollsters, Louis Harris and George Gallup, were doing some hedging.

The new Harris survey showed that Humphrey has been gaining in October and is now only five points behind Nixon, 35 percent to 40 percent, with 18 percent for Wallace. The Wallace percentage is down by three.

Harris observed that if Humphrey picks up two to three more points and with the standard margin of error 2 to 4 percent, the election would become "too close to call."

Gallup has not had a poll announced in several weeks, but despite a fifteen percent Nixon lead, said that there were too many undecided and declined to predict the outcome.

"The election looks much closer than you have learned from the polls—Gallup, Harris and the others," Bean told a B'nai B'rith luncheon here. He also questioned "why two national pollsters of equal competence should be so far apart."

Bean had another interesting observation, that if Humphrey "can do as well as Goldwater did in the closing weeks of 1964, he's in."

In a detailed analysis in The Washington Post, Bean said that "the state-by-state polls that have recently become available do not square with either of these national polls. They point to a much closer race than is generally assumed."

Polls in about a dozen states, most of which were made by the two major parties, cover Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Texas and California. They represent 253 electoral votes.

"If we take these twelve state polls," Bean said, "they show on a two-party basis, an average for Humphrey somewhat ahead of Nixon's average, 51 to 49."

He then shows that historically the outcome in these twelve states has closely paralleled the national outcome.

SPECIAL SECTION ON CONGRESS. This week we've got a special four page summary of the legislative accomplishments of the first and second sessions of the 90th Congress.

UAW Washington Report ELECTION FACTS

HUMPHREY APPEALS TO CONSCIENCE of all Americans and never stoops to fear and hate. He reaches out to voters during a campaign swing through California this year.

Now I'm not for Humphrey but I belong to this travel group with campers and so on and we have a lot of fun. They put out a magazine that I subscribe to and have for many years. This magazine sent a questionnaire to all three candidates for President. There were 12 questions about recreation and camping facilities and public parks. Things like that. Things about preserving our beautiful forests and streams. Well, to get on, of the 12 questions, Humphrey answered all 12 of them. And said we not only should preserve what we have but improve the others. Now Nixon turned his 12 questions over to his publicity man who answered most of them but said that some he would have to give more study. Wallace only answered six of the 12. —HDR

Clark is hero in genuine drive for law and order

There are encouraging signs that the era of racial outbreaks may be ending. Major or serious disturbances fell to 25 this summer from 46 last summer, by official count.

While there can be no single explanation for the drop, one reason, according to Attorney General Ramsey Clark, was more skillful police action. Violence, Clark said, was "usually controlled by adequate police manpower trained to neither overact or underact."

Much of the credit for improving American police work goes to Clark. The Law Enforcement Assistance Act that Clark nursed through Congress will bring even more results.

In some major cities police starting salaries have moved into the $8-$10,000 bracket, and educational requirements are rising. In Portland, Oregon, Deputy Sheriffs now must have a college degree. In the last three years, the number of states offering college courses in Police Science has doubled. This means twice as many professionally trained policemen.

Yet Attorney General Clark is the very man Richard Nixon most frequently attacks and promises to replace. Nixon howls about the need for tough law enforcement, but as New York Times Columnist Tom Wicker points out, Nixon's emphasis "is seldom on the improvement of police personnel, techniques, working conditions and understanding, all of which have to precede any really effective law enforcement."

This is precisely the emphasis of Vice President Humphrey, and it is starting to bring good results, if this year's relatively cool summer is any indication.

It's not surprising that Nixon, who selected a man like Spiro Agnew for his running mate, would want to dump Ramsey Clark. The Attorney General is a kind of Texas version of Ed Muskie—sincere, plain-talking and effective.

Meanwhile, in a grim example of a different kind of "law enforcement," the Chief of the Minutemen, Robert De Pugh, admitted in a newspaper story that local Police Forces "have tipped us off repeatedly in time" for him and his aides to avoid arrest by federal agents.

This statement was written out by De Pugh and relayed through intermediaries to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. He and another leader of the Minutemen are wanted on charges of conspiracy to rob a bank in the state of Washington.

The Minutemen, a right-wing extremist group, is tied in with the George Wallace campaign. In May, De Pugh issued an appeal on behalf of Wallace from the Minutemen's "Underground Headquarters."

In Connecticut, on August 24, a group of the Minutemen, trying to burn down a pacifist camp, fought a close-range gun battle with police and four of the extremists were wounded. One, Louis J. Rogers of Lisbon, Connecticut, had been recently identified as the Wallace-for-President Chairman in his hometown; another, Frank D. Barber, has been co-chairman of the Wallace movement in Norwich.

It seems the Wallace campaign in some places is a vehicle for right-wing extremists to get a foothold in police departments and then subvert federal law enforcement. This is law and order, Wallace style.

We'll take Hubert Humphrey and Ramsey Clark.

The 90th Congress plus and minus

We may never again see so much legislative accomplishment in so short a time. Summing up, the record is great —but the full impact may not be felt for several more years.

The 90th Congress is history now—and its record is better than most people expected. Much better. In fact, it's pretty good considering how many good liberal Congressmen went down to defeat in 1966. Put all together, the combined record of the 89th and 90th Congress during the past four years is outstanding. It may be a long, long time before we get a better Congress than these two landmark congresses.

Nearly everybody knows how great the 89th Congress was, but the 90th Congress which folded its tents this past week was no slouch either.

The 90th Congress (which served during the two years 1967 and 1968) passed massive programs in consumer protection, housing, education, conservation, and gun control which will enrich and improve the quality of life for this and future generations.

The 90th Congress wrote some far reaching legislation which will make America better for all of her citizens.

Consumers gained much, housing will be better, education was helped, conservation was a winner and gun control finally—that's what 90th Congress did for the American people.

Here's a rundown of key programs enacted by the 90th Congress:

Consumer Protection: We made real headway here. Gas pipeline safety; truth-in-lending; commission on product safety; two-year federal government investigation of auto insurance; meat inspection; poultry inspection; and flammable fabrics protection.

Housing: Some important gains in ridding America of slums. A three year $5.3 billion program to upgrade American housing including a program for 1.7 million units of new and rehabilitated housing for low-income families was adopted by the 90th Congress.

Education: More of the great things started by the 89th Congress. Programs and funds (including some unfortunate cutbacks in spending where it was needed most) for higher education, training of health manpower, vocational and technical training, the National Teacher Corps, and numerous other educational programs launched, paid for, and extended by the 90th Congress.

Conservation: Some last minute, great programs to save the outdoors for people. The action came during the closing hours of the 90th Congress, but they mean much to all Americans. A new system of financing land acquisition for parklands was added to the Land and Water Conservation Fund (including use of general revenue and royalties from offshore oil); national system of scenic rivers, national system of trails; Redwood National Park (saving this magnificent stand of timber from commercial chainsaws); and North Cascades National Park (the American Alps saved at last).

Gun Control: A tough fight won. Congress did finally pass a bill regulating the sale of firearms, which fully protects their legitimate use by sportsmen. This was a legislative victory for sanity.

Below are excerpts from a list prepared by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield which gives greater detail to the achievements of both the first and second sessions of the 90th Congress:

THE 90TH CONGRESS FIRST SESSION

Landmark bills

1. Elementary and Secondary Education Act Amendments of 1967—Strengthened and extended the Act for two years (P.L. 90-247).
2. Education Professions Act—Broadened and strengthened training programs for educational personnel at all levels (P.L. 90-35).
3. Air Quality Act—Strengthened the Clean Air Act by providing for air quality regions, regional air quality standards, aid to States for automobile emission inspection standards, and expanded research on air pollutants (P.L. 90-148).
4. Partnership for Health—Extended and expanded the Partnership for Health program, including grants for health planning, services and research (P.L. 90-174).

WORKERS ON THE JOB with UAW contracts know that wages and contracts are better today, but few realize how much Congress has done to make life better. The full listing on these pages tells of the immense work Congress did in 1967 and 1968. It's quite an outpouring of work that adds up to a better America.

POOR WHITE PEOPLE gained the most from the anti-poverty work of the Johnson administration. Nixon and Wallace would destroy the gains which thousands of families like these made during the past 8 years since the Democratic Party gained control of the federal government.

"The American labor movement is involved in politics, not as a matter of choice, but as a matter of necessity. We have learned by hard experience that workers cannot protect the gains that they have won at the bargaining table unless they work together as citizens on the political and legislative fronts."

—UAW President WALTER P. REUTHER

There's much yet to do to rebuild and clean up for our cities, to educate our children to the utmost, to reform our tax laws, and to make the American dream of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness come true. But the work of two great congresses —the 89th and the 90th— have laid the foundations for magnificent progress for all Americans.

"Walter Lippmann . . . isn't he the one who backed Herbert Hoover in '32?"

Nixon anti-labor past lures funds of big business

The Republican Party's anti-labor platform and Richard M. Nixon's "private" letter to the securities industry, promising his sympathetic consideration if he is elected, are paying off in campaign contributions.

Widespread newspaper reports tell of "increasing numbers of business-sponsored political groups" which are gathering funds "in a determinedly discreet but broad-scale effort to elect 'friendly' candidates and offset labor's financial muscle at the polls."

One of the biggest of these groups is the "Exchange Firms Campaign Committee," which is raking in contributions from top officials of various stock exchange companies. Another is the "Effective Government Association" to which corporate officials and staff members of big Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith are contributing as individuals.

Merrill Lynch already is in hot water with the government on charges by the Securities and Exchange Commission staff that they gave inside information to one of their largest customers. Officers of the campaign fund deny that Merrill Lynch is breaking the law against campaign contributions by corporations and insist that the fund has nothing to do with the firm's troubles with the government.

Other corporate officials involved in the various fund-raising activities say the same thing, but concede that "to a degree" the financial community's political activities are in response to growing toughness on the part of the government as to what goes on in Wall Street.

They admit, too, that now that Nixon has made clear his intention to stop "heavy-handed" regulation of Wall Street if he is elected, many potential and actual donors will want to make sure that the Nixon campaign funds get their money.

There are other business groups that are contributing to various campaign funds on the basis of pending legislation that they don't like. The Wall Street Journal cites, for in-

The 'real' Nixon

ON SOCIAL SECURITY, Nixon favored cut-backs, opposed full expansion . . .

1. Refused to uphold Supreme Court addition of 750,000 workers to social security coverage (2/27/48).
2. Voted to exclude news vendors, setting stage for chipping away of social security (4/14/48).
3. Voted against full expansion of the social security system (10/5/49).
4. Voted to permit use of unemployment compensation funds to help break strikes (8/16/50).
5. Voted to shame needy off public assistance rolls by publicizing their names (7/19/51).
6. Failed to vote on amendment to increase payments to old people, blind and disabled (5/28/58).

ON LABOR MATTERS, Nixon supported Taft-Hartley, oposed strong minimum wage law . . .

1. Picked by Hartley to wind up general debate in favor of Hartley bill (1947).
2. Voted for outlawing industry-wide bargaining (4/17/47).
3. Voted for Taft-Hartley over President's veto (6/20/47).
4. Voted against Taft-Hartley repeal (5/3/49).
5. Voted for using Taft-Hartley injunction in 1952 steel dispute (6/10/52).
6. Voted to abolish Wage Stabilization Board's authority to handle non-economic labor disputes (6/4/52).
7. Voted for excluding 1,000,000 workers from minimum wage protection (8/10/49).

ON HOUSING AND RENTS, Nixon unfailingly followed the real estate lobby line . . .

1. Helped block low-rent housing bill (6/18/48).
2. Voted against slum-clearance, low-rent housing, farm housing bill (6/29/49).
3. Voted against middle-income housing (aid to housing cooperatives) (3/22/50).
4. Voted to cut low-rent housing program to a trickle (6/20/51 and 6/3/52).
5. Voted to raise GI interest rates (3/12/58).
6. Voted for higher housing prices by voting to exempt new housing from credit curbs (8/10/50).

ON TAXES, Nixon favored tax relief for the wealthy and corporations, opposed efforts at fairer sharing of tax load . . .

1. Consistently voted for GOP tax-reduction bills, favoring the wealthy (6/17/47; 7/18/47; and 4/2/48).
2. Voted to save U.S. corporations $500,000,000 by delaying a tax increase 3 months (9/26/51).
3. Voted against raising capital gains tax by 3%, while favoring hikes in ordinary income taxes (9/28/51).

ON PUBLIC INFORMATION, Nixon tried to deny taxpayers access to information on government programs . . .

1. Sponsored an amendment making a 25% cut in the information funds for the Department of Agriculture (7/25/51).
2. Voted for an amendment prohibiting the use of foreign aid funds to explain in this country the foreign aid program (5/28/52).

ON POWER DEVELOPMENT, Nixon favored high power rates and high utility profits, and opposed low-rate public power developments . . .

1. Supported drastic GOP cuts in Western power and reclamation funds (4/25/47).
2. Voted for higher power and water rates on Western reclamation projects (1/22/48).
3. Voted against TVA steam plants needed for steady low-cost power supply (5/11/48; 6/19/48; and 6/3/52).

ON EDUCATION, Nixon as Vice President cast tie-breaking vote in Senate against federal aid for school construction and teachers' salaries (2/3/60).

UAW Washington Report ELECTION FACTS

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Hubert Humphrey is not relaxing a second as he races right down to the final wire in the 1968 presidential race. Humphrey is going to badger Nixon until the final hour of the election. The Harris poll showed only a 5 point gap, Gallup more—but all pollsters now agree it's a wild political year with many voters still trying to make up their mind. Wallace is losing ground very fast. His selection of General LeMay was a total disaster. The labor-hating lawless element backing Wallace is another big minus. But as long as people feed on fear and frustration, Wallace has support even though it's beginning to fade. . . . A reporter who traveled with Nixon for six days last week said Nixon mentioned Agnew's name only once, and only in reply to a question. Agnew is a drag to the Republican ticket, and nobody knows this better than Richard Nixon. That's why Nixon never mentions Agnew's name unless he has to. . . . The Sindlinger poll taken by telephone showed earlier this week Wallace dropped from 16.8 percent the first week in October to 10.4 percent this week. Humphrey, meanwhile, went up from 27.7 percent to 31 percent during the same time. Nixon stayed the same at roughly 38 percent. Among all people of voting age, regardless of registration status, Humphrey stands at 33.6 percent now while Nixon is only a few points above him at 36.3 percent. The Christian Science Monitor over the weekend showed Humphrey moved up in 24 states, while Nixon and Wallace lost ground. It's a real ball game, and both Nixon and Wallace know it. Wallace has never been a serious contender. His only desire has been to mess things up and stir up as much hate and dissension as he can. It's done in a folksy way which fools a lot of people. Many workers have worn Wallace buttons little realizing that Wallace is supported by the worst anti-labor elements in the whole country. Wallace has the 100 percent backing and active support of the John Birth Society. It's a pretty weird setup and a lot of innocent workers have been sucked unsuspectingly into the Wallace whirlpool of hate, bitterness, and fear. . . . You can hardly pick up a business or conservatively-oriented publication these days without reading an article which predicts more unemployment under a Nixon administration. While many UAW members with seniority are protected during brief recessions, every worker with or without SUB will get hit with tougher contract bargaining and tougher handling of grievances if the whole country is beset by recessions and widespread unemployment. Nixon's election will make life miserable for your union, no question about it. The Community Action chairman of UAW International Harvester Local 1309 in Rock Island, Illinois, writes that: "We did have some Wallace supporters here, but the enclosed leaflet helped to change their minds. It did work. Now, there are only a few die-hards left." He goes on to say that some of the Wallace crowd may not care about brotherhood, social justice or nuclear bombs, "but there is one thing they love. That is their paycheck. They will vote for the candidates who will help them with their car payments, house payments, and helps them put groceries in the refrigerators. The car payments comes first and then social justice."

'First, Mr. Chief Justice sir, I didn't mean all those things I've said about the court!'

NIXON ANTI-LABOR

stance, scrap dealers who don't like "arbitrary" standards of pay and working conditions set up by the U.S. Labor Department, and private employment agencies which don't want competition from the U.S. Employment Service.

Other groups cited are:

"The Committee on American Principles," set up by the apparel manufacturers industry; "The Saving Association Political Education Committee," set up to help "friendly legislators"; "The Life Underwriters Political Action Committee," one of whose officers laments that they "can't find enough Democrats to support"; "The Committee for Action," which wants favorable rates for carrying iron ore.

One of the legal gimmicks that is being used to justify the outpouring of business money is that while corporations can't contribute as such, their officers, as individuals, can. Another is that the bar against corporate contributions does not extend to partnerships.

How much money has been raised is still unknown, but it is plenty. A Wall Street Journal compilation would indicate that the sums already raised, or to be raised, will be more than $900,000, with the million dollar mark all but a certainty.

Who are the urban poor?

Summary of Factual Findings

The following significant findings and conclusions can be drawn from the extensive data and analysis presented in the body of this paper.*

• 1. Poverty in the United States is officially measured by a fixed standard of real income based upon the cost of a minimal human diet. But the concept of poverty is actually quite complex and controversial; so all statistics concerning it must be used and interpreted with caution.

a. Any household is officially defined as "poor" by the Social Security Administration if its annual money income is less than three times the cost (in current prices) of a minimal diet for the persons in that household. In 1967, the "poverty level" income for a four-person household was $3,335.

b. In comparison with the incomes of much of the world's population, many Americans considered poor by this definition are actually quite well-off. On the other hand, official "poverty level" incomes are very low in comparison with either the nation's median household income (now over $8,000) or the income considered necessary for a "moderate" standard of living by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (over $9,300 for a four-person household).

c. Since the official definition of poverty is based upon an absolutely fixed level of income, continued national prosperity that raises all incomes in society inevitably causes the number of poor people to decline steadily. But if poverty is considered a relative matter, its disadvantages will continue to affect all people in the lowest income groups, unless there is a significant change in the distribution of income (which has not occurred in recent years).

d. All statistics concerning poverty in this paper are based upon the official Social Security Administration definition.

• 2. In 1966, about 12.1 per cent of the total metropolitan-area† population of the United States—or 15.2 million persons—lived in poverty.

a. This was somewhat lower than the percentage of all United States citizens in poverty (15.4 per cent), and much lower than comparable figures for any non-metropolitan areas.

b. Nevertheless, slightly over half of all poor persons in the United States lived in metropolitan areas in 1966.

• 3. Within metropolitan areas, the proportion of poor people in 1966 was almost twice as high in central cities (16.2 per cent) as in suburbs (8.6 per cent). Although more people lived in suburbs, the number of poor persons in central cities (9.5 million) was significantly larger than the number in suburbs (5.7 million).

• 4. About two-thirds of all the poor persons in metropolitan areas in 1966 were white, and one-third nonwhite. However, the proportion of all metropolitan-area whites who were poor (9.3 per cent) was less than one-third the proportion of such nonwhites who were poor (32.1 per cent).

a. About 82 per cent of the poor nonwhites and 53 per cent of the poor whites in metropolitan areas lived in central cities.

b. Within central cities, 57 per cent of all poor persons were white, and 43 per cent nonwhite. But 84 per cent of all poor suburbanites were white.

• 5. From 1959 to 1966, the total number of poor persons in the United States dropped by 9.2 million (or by 23.6 per cent), from 38.9 million to 29.7 million. Similarly, the number and proportion of poor persons in almost every specific category (race, age, sex, etc.) declined in the same period in the nation as a whole. No separate data are available for trends in metropolitan areas alone, but it is reasonable to conclude that poverty in those areas decreased to about the same degree as in the entire nation.

• 6. *About 47 per cent of all poor in metropolitan areas are in households that cannot be expected to become economically self-sustaining at any time in the future. These households include:

Type of Household Head	Per Cent of All Poor Persons in Metropolitan Areas
Elderly	18.9%
Disabled males under 65	6.4%
Females under 65 with children	21.3%
Total	46.6%

• 7. Nearly one-third of all poor persons in metropolitan areas (31.4 per cent) are in households headed by employed men under 65 whose poverty results from low earnings rather than unemployment, disability, or old age.

*CED Supplementary Paper #26—October 1968

†For the purposes of this Paper "urban poverty" means "poverty within metropolitan areas" rather than "poverty within all communities with 2,500 or more inhabitants."

This conclusion assumes that one-fourth of all households headed by females under 65 and containing children can be expected to earn sufficient incomes to become self-sustaining above the poverty level. If no such households can be expected to do this, than the total above would be 53.7 per cent, instead of 46.6 per cent.

• 8. About one-seventh of all metropolitan-area poor persons are in households headed by non-disabled men under 65 who are unemployed.

• 9. About 6.3 million poor people in metropolitan areas—or 41.7 per cent of all such people in 1966—were children under 18. The poverty in which they lived is likely to inflict them in such a way as to reduce their future income-earning capabilities.

a. Almost two-thirds of these poor children lived in central cities, and over half the poor children in those cities were nonwhite.

b. From 36 to 45 per cent of all poor children in metropolitan areas lived in households unlikely to become economically self-sustaining.

c. Poor children are heavily concentrated in large families. In the United States as a whole, 45.2 per cent of all poor children in 1966 were in families with five or more children.

• 10. Although poverty is technically defined as having a very low annual income, for many people it is also a chronic state of failure, disability, dependency, defeat, and inability to share in most of American society's major material and spiritual benefits. Their continuance in this deprived state is reinforced by many institutional arrangements in our society, including those supposedly designed to aid them.

• 11. Future population changes in metropolitan areas are likely to cause certain groups with a high incidence of poverty, particularly within central cities, to expand greatly. Whether this will result in any increase in the number of poor persons depends upon future public policies and prosperity levels.

a. The greatest absolute growth from 1960 to 1985 will occur in the following "poverty-prone" population groups: suburban white elderly; central city nonwhite children under 18; central city nonwhite households with female heads under 65; and white and nonwhite households headed by unemployed males under 65 in both central cities and suburbs.

b. Large absolute growth will also occur among suburban white childen under 18—enough to add as much as one million of these children to urban poverty by 1985.

c. The nonwhite population of all U.S. central cities is expected to rise by 9.8 million—or 94.5 per cent—from 1960 to 1985. Since this population contains many highly "poverty-prone" groups, such rapid growth could cause sharp increases in nonwhite poverty within central cities—especially in the largest cities, where, in many cases, nonwhites will form a majority of the population by 1985. But major rises in nonwhite poverty will probably not occur unless present high-level prosperity slackens, thus causing higher unemployment and lower incomes for many partly-employed workers.

A REPORT FROM LOCAL 189's CONFERENCE:

Have unions failed white workers?

'We can't continue as we were . . .'

OVER - - - - -

Workers Education Local 189 of the AFT is the only nationwide local in the Federation. It has approximately 300 members, who are principally college and university faculty involved in labor education, and staffers in other international unions in the same field. The local meets twice yearly, once in winter and once in the spring. This article is a report of some of the local's activity at its recent winter meeting.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A straw Presidential preference vote taken at five AFL-CIO Young Worker schools in as many states this summer showed the two top vote-getters as George Wallace, with 28 percent of the vote, and Lyndon B. Johnson, with 25 percent.

The AFL-CIO is not publicizing this information, but the people involved in labor education in the nation's trade unions and universities are as deeply concerned with the meaning behind such statistics as is the AFL-CIO. In its winter meeting here in late November, Workers Education Local 189 of the AFT considered the problem in a panel titled "How Unions Failed White Workers."

"Of course," one of the members said from the floor just before the panel began, "we've been failing the black workers all along, and I wonder if the title of the panel has that in mind?" He was assured that it did.

WORKERS ARE WORSE OFF

Paul Booth, the first panelist, lit into the claim that the U.S. has recently had "eight years of unparalleled prosperity." Booth, a former research staffer for the Packinghouse Workers, now with the merged Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen and the Packinghouse union, fired off a volley of statistics showing that the average worker is considerably worse off now, in relationship to the general economy, than he was a decade ago.

"In 1959," Booth said, "39 percent of American families earned over the Department of Labor's 'moderate standard of living' budget; in 1966, only 30 per cent earned over that standard. The combined impact of inflation, taxes, and limited salary increases shows that a lot of people are not only squeezed in their perception of what is happening to them, but in the hard facts of life. The distribution of wealth in our society has been relatively unchanged during this period.

"A large group at the bottom still has nothing," Booth continued. "Those in the middle have very little stake in their attainments because of their heavily mortgaged futures. And while this is happening, the 1967 figure on corporation profits in this country is almost equal to a third of the total family income in the United States. However, in many countries, wage levels are treated not only as a matter of collective bargaining, but of political policy . . ."

Booth's analysis of the Wallace appeal was that "He was the first guy to come along and politicize, in his own racist and funny way, the situation of the working man in the country today, and thus the first guy to win a passionate audience of its victims."

ALIENATION AMONG WORKERS

Panelist Roger Robinson, who works for the Hotel and Restaurant Workers Union in Detroit, pointed out that in his area, the white worker "essentially comes out of a folk background, either ethnic or indigenous," and that the "basic pressure toward alienation from society is still felt by this worker at his workplace." If a worker felt his on-the-job grievances were taken care of, Robinson said, he wouldn't feel so alienated, but in some unions, he must make an appointment "downtown" to present a grievance, and the red tape effectively stifles a feeling of worker freedom. "The basic human demands of workers are most important," Robinson said, "and the only one I've seen come out of collective bargaining in this country is seniority rights." But then he pointed out the recent activities of black and white militants in such autoworkers' locals as those at Dodge, Cadillac, and in Flint, and said it was a hopeful sign.

"In an auto plant," Robinson explained, "if a guy is there four years, he'll be there for 40. He's got himself locked into a credit situation with the main item a 30-year mortgage on a tract house that should never have been created in the first place. The guy on the line doesn't see the union working on his problems as it did in the '30s."

The third young panelist, Jim Williams of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, spoke of the "productivity box," which is the limited way of thinking that wages cannot rise unless productivity rises. "It keeps the shares in the economy the same," he said, and this status quo has been challenged by the movements today among black people and poor people.

"In the Wallace, Nixon, and McCarthy campaigns, there was a movement away from the status quo," Williams said, "but only Wallace was able to touch the working class, and he did it with a radical, albeit fascist, approach.

FROM McCARTHY TO WALLACE

"In Charleston, W. Va., workers who had supported McCarthy, after August, ripped the McCarthy stickers off their cars and put on Wallace stickers.

"Most of the recent social gains of the War on Poverty are evoking a great deal of resentment among the working class," Williams continued. He explained that workers believe the poor are able to secure benefits, such as medical attention, that the average worker is unable to buy adequately for himself. "The tax structure in this country is still loaded against the working class," Williams said. "They are, basically, being forced to pay the costs of the programs for others that they can't afford for themselves.

"Wallace, and to some extent, Nixon, were talking about the real issues, about war and racism, while the AFL-CIO was talking about the level of unemployment compensation in Alabama," Williams said. He added that he expects the economic situation to "get worse," and that "how we react in the future will depend on the political moves of labor. We should have medical and housing programs for everybody. Up until now, we have been working on it a piece at a time, and this has created a counter-current among our own people. If workers feel that black people, under the present economic situation, present a threat to their jobs and property values, it is that they do, and the answer is to work for gains for all."

And, Williams concluded, "In this new administration, the political stance of labor will have to be reevaluated. Will 'all the way with LBJ' be translated to 'all the way with Tricky Dick?' We can't continue as we were in 1968, punishing our friends who were against the war in Vietnam, for example, and rewarding our enemies . . ."

THE 1968 ELECTIONS AND BEYOND

by John M. Barry

When if finally became clear, at mid-morning of November 6, that Richard M. Nixon had been chosen by the voters as the 37th President of the United States, the President-elect's first public action was to pledge that the "great objective" of his Administration would be "to bring the American people together."

"This will be an open Administration," Nixon said, "open to new ideas, open to men and women of both parties, open to the critics as well as those who support us."

The pledge amounted to frank recognition of the sharp divisions among the American people reflected in the election results.

But implicit in Nixon's remarks was something more—an acknowledgment that in the very closeness of the election victory they gave him, the American people had hedged.

They had made it clear that while they were voting for change, they were not prepared for a radical shift in federal policies toward conservative Republicanism. They had chosen to place a Republican in the White House for the next four years, but they had imposed certain limits on the leadership mandate they gave him.

The dimensions of these limits are apparent in the election results themselves:

- Nixon's popular vote margin over his Democratic rival, Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, with nearly all precincts recorded unofficially by the News Election Service, was only 312,605—less than half of 1 percent of the nearly 72 million votes cast for President.
- The popular vote for the winner—a little more than 31 million votes—amounted to only 43.16 percent of the total, the smallest percentage for a victorious candidate since 1912, when Woodrow Wilson led another three-way race.
- Nixon will be the first new President since Zachary Taylor in 1848 to be elected while the opposition party retained control of both houses of Congress.

While recapturing the White House, the GOP fell far short in its well-organized and well-financed drive to win majority control of the House of Representatives. It scored a net gain of only four seats to make the prospective party lineup in the 91st Congress 243 Democrats and 192 Republicans. On the Senate side, the GOP was somewhat more successful, proportionately, picking up five seats to reduce the Democratic margin to 58-42. But with the Democrats defending 23 of the 34 seats at stake, this was well below Republican goals and left the Senate basically liberal-to-moderate in its makeup.

- Nixon won a clear majority of the electoral vote —302 to Humphrey's 191 and 45 for third-party candidate George C. Wallace. The results were so close in many of the key states, however, that a shift of less than 75,000 votes in Illinois and Missouri—the last two states to determine their results—would have destroyed the Republican's electoral vote majority. And if these plus two other close states, Ohio and New Jersey, had gone to Humphrey, the Democrat would be the President-elect today instead of Nixon.

With all this said, the fact remains that Nixon did win the election and that the American people accept him without question as their next President. And, despite the obvious handicaps that face him, there should be no reason to doubt that he can put together an effective Administration. He is by no means the first minority President; John F. Kennedy, for example, narrowly failed to achieve a popular vote majority when he defeated Nixon in the 1960 election. Other presidents have had to deal with opposition Congresses, most recently Dwight D. Eisenhower whom Nixon served for eight years as Vice President presiding over a Democratic Senate for three-fourths of that period with the House also in Democratic hands.

The Eisenhower era, moreover, offers a ready example of Democratic congressional leadership minimizing partisan politics to give a Republican President much of the program he sought.

Despite the thinness of his margin, Nixon's victory in his second bid for the presidency was a remarkable comeback from the political oblivion to which he had consigned himself in 1962, following his defeat for the governorship of California.

The origins of that comeback can be traced to the devastating defeat suffered in 1964 by the ultra-conservative Goldwater wing which had captured control of the GOP. The loss left the party in such division and disarray that Goldwater was unable to assert even token leadership.

In the mid-term congressional elections of 1966, House and Senate Republicans and the party's national committee turned once more to Nixon for help in regrouping their forces. He campaigned across the country for GOP candidates at all levels and at the same time established personal contacts among state and local party officials that were to prove invaluable to his own candidacy two years later.

In 1966, the GOP took 47 House seats away from the Democrats and Nixon's standing in the party jumped several notches. On the basis of this, and sensing perhaps a growing discontent in the nation over the war in Viet Nam and racial turmoil in the cities, Nixon reached a decision late in 1967 to seek the presidency once again. He formally announced his candidacy the following February 1 and set off on a series of successful primary campaigns. Although he had little or no opposition in the primaries, the former Vice President's record was nonetheless impressive as he ran up totals of 70 percent or more of the Republican vote and established himself as the foremost Republican prospect for the nomination.

Nixon went into the Republican National Convention last August well ahead of his two rivals—New York Governor Nelson Rockefeller and California Governor Ronald Reagan—in terms of delegate votes. He nailed down the nomination on the first ballot, but only after averting a threatened breakaway of some southern delegations by assuring them he would not offend them in his choice of a vice presidential candidate.

At least one political analyst, poll-taker Louis Harris, now credits Nixon's selection of Maryland Governor Spiro T. Agnew to be his running mate as the key decision leading to his eventual victory over Humphrey. The designation of Agnew, who had developed a reputation as a hardliner in dealing with racial problems, shocked many of the party's northern liberals, who saw in it a calculated decision to write off the labor and the Negro vote. But the choice clearly satisfied such southern Republican powers as Senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, the ex-Dixiecrat, and Senator John Tower of Texas.

Nixon's strategy, under this analysis, was aimed largely at piling up strong support in rural, suburban and small town areas. He hoped to retain at least those southern and border states that went for him in 1960 and perhaps add a few more against the combined opposition of Humphrey and Wallace in the region where the bulk of Wallace's strength lay.

As it turned out, this is almost precisely what happened. The same southern, midwestern and western states he drew upon to win the nomination gave him most of his electoral vote majority to win the election. In the South, he took Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, as he did in 1960, but he also added North Carolina and South Carolina. Overall, he lost only two of the 26 states he had carried against Kennedy eight years earlier—Maine and Washington, both of which went to Humphrey this time. But Nixon added eight states that he had lost to Kennedy—Delaware, Illinois, Missouri, Nevada, New Jersey and New Mexico, besides the two Carolinas.

Thus the strategy that brought Spiro Agnew to the Republican ticket did in fact succeed. It should be pointed out, however, that it very nearly did not succeed. The predominantly rural states by themselves were not enough to fashion the victory for the Republican candidate. Had he not taken Illinois and New Jersey from the Democrats—both by slim pluralities—he would have fallen short of the 270 electoral votes he needed.

The presence of Agnew on the ticket may also account in part for the failure of the Nixon campaign to generate any upward movement as the campaign progressed. The Republican slate came out of the conventions with the support, according to the polls, of 39 to 43 percent of the electorate, 8 to 12 points ahead of Humphrey and Senator Edmund S. Muskie of Maine. The election gave Nixon and Agnew just about the same percentage of the popular vote—43—whereas the Democrats had come within a whisker of closing the gap.

Muskie, indeed, proved to be one of Humphrey's greatest assets. His approach to the campaign was refreshingly calm but earnest, and he demonstrated a knack for disarming the hecklers who plagued all of the candidates. One mid-October poll showed that while voters at that time still preferred Nixon over Humphrey, they favored Muskie over Agnew overwhelmingly.

Humphrey, of course, was a formidable and courageous campaigner in his own right. Following the tumultuous Democratic National Convention in Chicago, where he won the nomination over Senator Eugene J. McCarthy, Humphrey found his party deeply split, its organization floundering and its campaign funds almost non-existent.

Few observers gave Humphrey any chance of overcoming Nixon's wide lead. But against all the odds he very nearly carried it off. His campaign, slow to develop momentum in the wake of the Chicago convention, never deviated from his central themes—an appeal for national unity, a pledge to work diligently for peace in Viet Nam and the same liberal approach to people and national problems he had espoused throughout his nearly 25 years in public office.

By early October, he had begun to strike a responsive chord among hitherto uncertain voters and party workers, including many of the McCarthy supporters who, when their candidate lost, bitterly vowed to sit out the election. Within a week, Humphrey had turned the corner to start the stretch drive that brought him to virtually a dead heat with Nixon in terms of the popular vote.

It is, however, the electoral vote that counts, and the Vice President carried only 13 states and the District of Columbia for 191 against Nixon's 302.

Most of Humphrey's support came from the populous, industrial East where he piled up 122 of his electoral votes, capturing eight of the 12 states in the region plus the District of Columbia. The region gave the Vice President 50.5 percent of its popular vote, according to a breakdown by Congressional Quarterly, against 42.6 percent for Nixon and only 6.9 percent for Wallace.

Nixon carried all the other regions, even the South where Humphrey ran third to Wallace.

Of the eight largest states, Humphrey took four—New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan and Texas—and came close in the other four—California, Illinois, New Jersey and Ohio.

While precinct by precinct breakdowns of the vote remain to be analyzed, it was clear that the Vice President had scored heavily among city dwellers, workers and the ethnic minorities. The Columbia Broadcasting System, on the basis of results in sample precincts, found Humphrey ahead in all cities with his margin varying directly with the size of the populace. CBS credited Humphrey with 59 percent of the vote in cities of 500,000 or more against 34 percent for Nixon and 7 percent for Wallace. In cities of 50,000 to 500,000, the analysis showed the Democrat getting 51 percent of the vote to 40 percent for Nixon and 9 percent for Wallace. In smaller cities, the indication was 46 percent for Humphrey, 45 percent for Nixon and 8 percent for Wallace. Nixon was the favorite in the suburbs, with 51 percent to Humphrey's 40 and Wallace's 9, and in the small towns and rural areas, with 48 percent to 37 percent for the Democrat and 16 percent for Wallace.

Even so, the results in the cities were spotty. Big Humphrey pluralities in New York City and Philadelphia, for example, gave him the margins he needed to carry New York State and Pennsylvania. But the Democratic vote in Chicago was well below what Kennedy polled in 1960 when he barely carried Illinois. This time the state went to the Republicans.

The CBS analysis crediting Humphrey with 59 percent of the vote in the largest cities compares with 63.5 percent for Kennedy in 1960. The dropoff, however, was much less than the Democrats suffered in the country as a whole.

Among minorities, CBS found Humphrey scoring 78 percent in Mexican-American precincts and 79 percent in Negro ghetto areas. A sampling by the National Broadcasting Company found the vote for Humphrey to be even higher in all-black precincts, averaging somewhat more than 90 percent.

Thus the old coalition of workers, minorities, liberals and big city organizations that has formed the core of Democratic strength since New Deal days was still very much alive. The one element that deserted the party in the 1968 election was the South, increasingly a bastion of conservatism, where Humphrey managed to carry only Texas.

One factor that may have been critical in denying Humphrey the victory was the decline in the percentage of eligible voters who went to the polls. The total vote for the presidency, now estimated at 72 million, was itself a record, but because of population growth it represented only about 60 percent of the eligible vote compared with 62.1 percent in 1964 and 63.2 percent in 1960. In Illinois, which proved to be a pivotal state, the actual vote total this year was less than in the two previous presidential elections. A bigger vote ordinarily could be expected to benefit the Democrats and this year it could have meant the difference for Humphrey.

Analysts will be arguing for months, too, over the "spoiler" role played by Wallace, the candidate of the American Independent Party. Wallace succeeded in having himself listed on the ballots of all 50 states and the question remained: Whom did he hurt most—Nixon or Humphrey?

It is conceivable that had Wallace not been a candidate, Nixon might have carried some of the strongly conservative southern states that went to the former Alabama governor. On the other hand, a shift of just a percentage point or two might have given Humphrey some of the closely contested northern states he lost. New Jersey Governor Richard Hughes, for one, was emphatic in blaming the Wallace candidacy for the Democrats' failure to take his state. Nixon's plurality over Humphrey in New Jersey was only 53,000, whereas Wallace received about 260,000 for 9.1 percent of the total.

From his own standpoint, however, the election produced only failure for Wallace. In the campaign, he had talked boldly of actual victory, but his realistic objective was to win enough electoral votes to deny a majority to either of the two major contenders and thus establish a bargaining position from which he could seek a deal on federal appointments and policies.

It was clear, too, that a good showing for Wallace outside the South would have given him a national base on which to build for a new challenge in 1972. He failed to achieve any of these goals and emerged from the election as no more than a sectional candidate whose racist-oriented appeal was taken seriously only by the hard-core radical right.

Wallace carried only five states with 45 electoral votes—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana and Mississippi. Three of them were among the four that went for Dixiecrat Strom Thurmond and his States' Rights Party in 1948 and four were among the six states that backed Goldwater in 1964.

In terms of popular votes, Wallace's nationwide percentage of 13.6 was well below the 20 percent that polls early in the campaign indicated he would draw. It also compared dismally with previous third-party efforts—16.6 percent for Robert M. LaFollette and the Progressive movement in 1924 and 27.4 percent for Theodore Roosevelt, the Progressive (Bull Moose) candidate in 1912.

Outside the South, Wallace's share of the popular vote ran less than 10 percent, hitting such low points as 1.4 percent in Hawaii, 1.7 percent in Maine, 5.2 percent in New York and 6.8 percent in California.

He ran poorly even with working-class voters among whom he had hoped to pile up his strongest support in the North. The polls had indicated he might be right, but the actual results showed that he had little support in or around the cities.

The CBS sample precinct analysis showed that Wallace's strongest showing was in rural and small town areas, where he drew 16 percent of the vote. His main strength, CBS found, was among farm whites and this came mostly in the South.

Wallace's failure to do well among workers was credited by most observers to a vigorous campaign by organized labor that succeeded in exposing the fraudulent nature of Wallace's claims to be a friend of the working man and his links to ultra-rightwing, anti-union extremists.

The closeness of the election, combined with the drain of 45 electoral votes to Wallace, did produce, however, what Senator Birch Bayh of Indiana called a "brush with catastrophe" for the Electoral College system of choosing the President.

As noted, if Nixon had lost a few of the major states where his margin was thin, he would have failed to win the needed majority of 270. Then, if there were no shifts among the electors, it would have been up to the House to name the President from the three leading candidates. Conceivably, in such cases, an impasse could create a serious crisis of leadership for the nation. The nightmarish visions of what might have happened are expected to spur a new drive in Congress for reform of the electoral system.

With the election now history and the nation in the midst of a transition period before the Nixon Administration takes office, the major question is what to expect from the President-elect.

To a large extent, the answer lies in the nature of the problems confronting America, the very issues of the election campaign itself: the war in Viet Nam, rising crime rates, the growing polarization of the races, poverty and decay in the central cities.

In the course of his campaign, Nixon provided some clues to his approach in dealing with these problems.

He rigidly refused to expand on his ideas for resolving the war on grounds he would do nothing to hamper peace negotiations, and he has taken a stance alongside President Johnson regarding subsequent developments in the Paris talks.

On the problems of poverty and the need to rejuvenate urban areas, he urged a broader role for private enterprise. He spoke of building "bridges to human dignity" between Negroes and whites and he pledged to encourage "black capitalism" in the ghetto.

None of these positions is so specific as to commit him to a given course of action. They leave him, in fact, able to exercise a great deal of flexibility. In the light of his narrow victory and the retention of Congress by the Democrats, flexibility is something the new President can use in large measure.

Nixon, of course, will have vast independent authority. As chief executive, it will be his responsibility to reformulate the foreign policy of the most powerful nation in the world. He can set the tone of his administration simply through his choices for cabinet posts and personal advisers, through the men he picks for such regulatory agencies as the Federal Trade Commission and the National Labor Relations Board. He can reshape the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts more to his liking as vacancies occur. And he can alter the direction of the economy.

But what the new President can hope to accomplish immediately in coping with the nation's pressing problems depends, by and large, on the relationship he is able to establish with Congress.

The Shape of the 91st Congress

by David L. Perlman

In membership, party control and its liberal-conservative division, the new 91st Congress will be at least a fraternal twin of the departing 90th Congress.

The House of Representatives changed hardly at all. There was normal attrition through retirements, but only nine incumbents were defeated for re-election. The freshman crop of 39 new congressmen out of 435 is the smallest in many years.

Not a single committee chairmanship will change hands. Power in the House remains where it has been —with the very senior chairmen of the major committees, leavened somewhat by the gentle persuasion of Speaker John W. McCormack, who will be starting his 41st year as a congressman.

It was a bitter disappointment to Republican strategists that the House elections were a virtual standoff.

The four-seat GOP gain was far short of the switch of 30 seats needed for a Republican majority.

Even Democratic sources, in private if not in public, had anticipated a 10 to 15 seat loss to the Republicans.

The GOP hopes, however, depended on a big Nixon victory. The razor-thin closeness of the presidential election cut off the coattails which were to carry Republican congressional candidates into office.

Not only was the election close, but Nixon ran weakest in the populous eastern states where Democratic congressional candidates were considered most vulnerable.

Take three big two-party states: New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Before the 1964 Democratic sweep, the three states had sent 40 Democrats and 43 Republicans to the House. The big Democratic gains of 1964 were only partially wiped out in the 1966 Republican comeback and the Democrats held a 49-34 edge in House seats going into the 1968 elections. At least 10 Democratic seats were in normally Republican or marginal districts and several incumbents were not running for re-election. The GOP had reason to hope for a substantial pick-up.

Some seats changed hands. But when the smoke cleared, Democrats held the same 49-34 majority of House seats from the three states as in the 90th Congress.

In fact, of all the threats to liberal and moderate Democratic congressmen anticipated in pre-election speculation, about the only one that came off was the GOP capture of both of New Mexico's House seats.

From the viewpoint of the conservative-liberal division in the House, it would take calipers to measure the difference between the 90th and 91st Congress.

Everyone, of course, has his own definition of liberal and conservative. Congressional Quarterly, a nonpartisan press service, considers 172 members of the outgoing House as liberals, 193 as conservative and 70 as moderates. It says the new House will have two fewer liberals, four fewer conservatives and six more moderates.

Other sources might come up with a different ideological breakdown. The key fact is that there are still more conservatives than liberals in the House.

The 1968 elections confirmed the Democratic Party as the majority party in Congress—a position it has held for 34 of the past 40 years. Nevertheless, the 243-192 Democratic majority in the House is the smallest in 10 years.

By past cycles, the Democrats should pick up some House seats in the 1970 congressional elections. This year, the virtual standoff in the House demonstrated a deep-rooted Democratic strength. But even a small Republican gain two years from now would be taken as a sign of continuing Republican growth in the nation.

Only 34 of the 100 Senate seats were at stake in the November election, but 14 of them will be filled by newcomers. The 14 include Barry Goldwater, not exactly a freshman, who returns to the Senate as a replacement for the retiring 91-year-old Carl Hayden.

Six senators retired, four lost out in their party's primaries and four were defeated for re-election.

The departures will bring about a reshuffle of committee chairmanships and, of nearly equal importance, subcommittee chairmanships.

Yet despite the new faces and a net Republican gain of five seats, the change in the Senate does not go very deep, although it has significance.

The Senate had a moderate-to-liberal majority before the election—and it still does.

It had a hardcore conservative coalition big enough to conduct a successful filibuster—and it still does.

The swing man in determining by his support or opposition whether a filibuster will succeed or fail has been Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. There is no reason to think that it will be any different in the 91st Congress.

There is a net liberal loss, however, and the Republican gain was the biggest in any single election since 1950, when the GOP also won five new seats.

An unusual number of longterm senators were beaten for re-election this year, either in primaries or in the general election.

In a few of the contests, issues and ideology were principal factors. Thus conservative Democrat Frank Lausche of Ohio was beaten by liberal John J. Gilligan, who in turn lost to moderate Republican William B. Saxbe. In California, liberal Republican Thomas H. Kuchel was defeated in the primary by rightwinger Max Rafferty—and liberal Democrat Alan Cranston won the election.

Most, but not all, of the defeated senators were beaten by younger opponents.

The new senators—even counting "retread" Barry Goldwater—are on an average more than 19 years younger than the men they replace.

The Democrats went into the election with a 63-37 majority in the Senate and 23 of the 34 seats at stake.

Since the 23 Democratic seats up this year included some that were virtually certain to remain Democratic, the GOP had no realistic hope of taking over control of the Senate.

By closing the gap to a 58-42 margin, however, the Republican Party has at least brought itself within reach of a 1970 majority. At stake that year will be 25 Democratic and only eight Republican seats.

A bipartisan group of liberals may make another try at the start of the new Congress to change the Senate rules so as to make it easier to cut off a filibuster. But with the Senate having edged to the right, the chances of success appear even slimmer than in past years.

With an almost identical House and with Senate changes more in personalities than in power, the outlook would appear to be some progress in legislation, a good deal of compromise and a constant battle for funding of programs—all of course depending on the direction taken by the White House.

The 90th Congress was parsimonious with appropriations, both for domestic programs and foreign aid.

It was amenable to consumer protection laws which cost little but earned political credit with the articulate suburban voting bloc.

It took a surprisingly bold stand for a federal open housing law. And while it moved in the direction of giving states a freer hand in the use of federal grants, it stopped short of the "no strings" approach in handing over federal funds.

The "nay-saying" conservative coalition was successful in blocking planned expansion of a number of programs, but it made few efforts to eliminate going programs and it did not develop any real alternatives.

The votes were not on hand in the 90th Congress to pass any meaningful improvement in labor laws—nor to adopt harsh new restrictions.

But even with virtually the same cast, it would be rash to assume that the performance of the 91st Congress will follow the script of the 90th.

Lyndon Baines Johnson, in the tradition of liberal Democratic presidents, kept a steady flow of legislative requests moving to Capitol Hill.

His proposals sought to utilize the vast resources and power of the federal government to solve problems confronting the nation—problems of poverty and pollution, of education, housing, health, job training, crime, safety and traffic congestion.

These ambitious but necessary programs had to run the gantlet of a conservative coalition made up of most Republicans and most southern Democrats. Where it could not ignore the pressing messages from the executive branch of government, it usually was able to modify the requests to more digestible size—particularly when it came to backing up legislation with appropriations.

There is also a liberal-moderate coalition made up of most Democrats and a minority of Republicans. Not even in the heavily Democratic 89th Congress, elected in 1964, were there enough Democratic votes alone to pass all the major legislation. About 20 Republicans can be counted on to vote with northern Democrats on most social issues.

It is this alternate coalition that Democratic presidents have counted on to enact at least a substantial part of their programs.

A Republican president needs a coalition also. Dwight D. Eisenhower needed Democratic votes in the first two years of his Administration, even with a Republican majority in Congress, because some congressional Republicans had become so accustomed to saying "no" that they were unable to accept even the modest program of a president of their own party.

And from the 1954 elections until the end of his Administration six years later, Eisenhower had to deal with a Democratic Congress.

In all major areas, Eisenhower received more support from congressional Democrats than Republicans had ever given to a Democratic president.

At the same time, congressional Democrats were coming up with legislative proposals in areas where Eisenhower was moving too slowly. During recurrent recessions, it was congressional Democrats, not the White House, who pressed for extended unemployment benefits, depressed areas legislation and public works programs. The battle for medicare was waged, if not won, during this period of a Democratic Congress and a Republican president.

This blend of cooperation and criticism awaits Richard M. Nixon as he assumes the presidency.

If he intends to be an active, forceful president, he will soon find himself in conflict with a large segment of Congress because that is the nature of the division of powers of the American government.

Mr. Nixon, facing a Democratic Congress, has a unique choice of allies for his legislative program.

Whatever he proposes will normally receive substantial support from congressional Republicans, if only out of party loyalty.

He has the option of looking for the balance of the votes from either the liberal majority or the conservative minority of the Democratic Party.

In effect, the choice of a liberal or a conservative coalition is up to him.

If he should choose the liberal road—admittedly a highly unlikely prospect—Nixon would be able to gain majority support for some programs that, with the same Congress, would probably be rejected if proposed by a Democratic President.

Mr. Nixon can, of course, look to the conservative coalition for support of programs strongly opposed by liberals and labor. But the coalition does not have control of the Senate and liberals have either a majority or the chairmanship of several important House committees, as well as the support of the House Democratic leadership on most issues.

In practical political terms, Congress as well as the President has a veto.

Any prediction of the relations between Congress and the President over the next two or four years must be pure speculation. So much depends on events—whether there will be what Hubert Humphrey confidently spoke of during the campaign as the "dividends of peace" to finance needed programs and whether a Republican President will choose to use Democratic-designed economic weapons to head off a recession.

This, however, can be said with some certainty. For better or worse, whatever the new President proposes will be shaped, trimmed or expanded by Congress. As they used to teach in history classes—with gross oversimplification—"the President proposes and Congress disposes."

Renewed activity on State & Local Taxes

sive governmental leaders—like Ngo Dinh Diem who subsidized rival unions in an effort to undercut Buu, whom he feared—by militant Buddhists or Viet Cong terrorists.

Through Buu's leadership, labor unions have been formed in virtually every occupational field in South Viet Nam. With varying degrees of effectiveness, they bargain with management, call strikes and perform other functions of trade unionism.

CVT's membership includes such varied crafts as gatherers of swallows' nests for soup-making, dispensers of leeches in Oriental medicine shops, teachers, horsecart drivers, pedalers of bike-powered rickshas, employes of jet-age airlines, fishermen and tillers of the soil.

Vietnamese labor officials are called on to deal with problems unheard of in the workaday world of their U.S. counterparts: Pregnant longshorewomen (women do much of the heavy work), harassed noodle cart operators besieged by police and tax collectors on one hand and racketeers on the other, military curfews that hamper fishermen, and the terrorism of the Viet Cong against union agents.

In a nation where 75 percent of the workforce is engaged in extracting food and fiber products from the land and waters, agricultural workers make up the bulk of CVT's strength. The biggest union within the CVT is that of the Tenant Farmers, with 130,000 members, followed by the Fishermen, with 65,000. Another large affiliate is the Plantation Workers, with 16,500. The membership of these unions is spread out over the countryside, even into Viet Cong-infested areas. Their size and effectiveness, also the mechanics of their dues-collecting, are subject to war's incursions.

CVT's largest urban-based affiliate is the Transportation Workers, with 22,000 members.

In addition to agricultural workers making up the bulk of its membership, the Vietnamese labor movement is unique in other respects.

Vietnamese workers, instead of leaning politically left as do union members in much of the western world, tend to Oriental conservatism, reflecting their predominantly rural roots, thus forming a bulwark of vigorous anti-Communism.

est in the U.S. labor movement, are relatively small in South Viet Nam.

A number of unions, like those of the noodle cart pushers, are associations of owner-operators of retail enterprises. There is also a pattern of small, one-company unions, examples being those representing workers in a cigaret plant, an alcohol factory or a boat-building yard.

Even bank employes have a union; so do Saigon bar girls and dancing girls.

Similar to industry-wide unions in the U.S. are those in Viet Nam composed of employes of several plants in a single industry, such as tile and concrete, beer, soft drinks, textiles, footwear, chemicals, paint, plastics and the processing of rubber, paper, rice and sugar.

Vietnamese unions measure success in small terms. Like a daily basic wage of 57 piasters—48 cents—for Plantation Workers and the elimination of the word "coolie" from their contracts. Or a cost of living allowance of 29 piasters a day. Or a 60-40 split of the catch between boat owners and the Fishermen's members. Or a free canteen, two uniforms each and time and a half for night work for workers in a construction materials plant.

These gains are important in a country where dock workers, semi-skilled laborers and factory hands average from 100 to 120 piasters a day and where 9,000 piasters a month—$76.50—is good money for a skilled mechanic.

Out of that income, organized workers pay about 20 piasters a month—17 cents—in union dues. A unique custom among some Vietnamese unions is that a new member pays no dues until his personal income rises as a direct benefit from his affiliation.

Vietnamese unions do not limit their horizon to bread and butter issues, but manifest a social conscience which has sparked one of the country's most extensive welfare programs. CVT's efforts fill a dire need in a country where most social welfare concepts follow the Confucian pattern of family members caring for one another.

The nucleus of the CVT social welfare program is a network of more than 20 centers, which offer adult and primary education classes, help for the sick, assistance with funeral expenses, canteens and such useful skills as sewing lessons. In provincial hamlets, CVT centers are headquarters for all social service projects, including credit union facilities.

Those families that benefit from the CVT social welfare centers are asked to help finance their operations with a two-piaster a month contribution per family. The centers are open to union and non-union families alike.

In the aftermath of the Communist Tet offensive in early 1968, CVT purchased 200 tons of rice from the government and distributed it through social welfare centers and union offices at official prices. This helped undercut the private entrepreneurs and black market racketeers who do not hesitate to reap a profit from the misery of their war-beleaguered countrymen.

The rice-distribution program was similar to other programs in which labor has used its organizational facilities to move the materials of war as well as the goods for the nation's economy.

One of CVT's most successful such programs has been its distribution of fertilizer to members and non-members in farming areas. Fertilizer may not be a subject of much interest to Americans, most of whom have no problem with food other than that of obesity, but it is essential in the production of Asia's food staple, rice.

In 1967, CVT was the biggest distributor of fertilizer, moving more than 55,000 tons while government agencies and other sources accounted for only 11,000 tons. The difference is motivation. CVT is out to win the allegiance of farmers, to make friends, not money. This attitude begets enemies among the commercial dealers, whose market-manipulations have been curtailed by labor's entry into the fertilizer business.

Despite CVT's altruistic motives, it encountered trouble in obtaining governmental approval for its 1968 fertilizer program. The Ministry of Economy, one of 26 cabinet-level bureaus in the central government, sought to limit CVT's distribution only to its members. This showed the concern of the minister of economy for the private operators. CVT, through its weekly newspaper and by enlisting help from the public press and friends in government, beat down the attempt to curtail its fertilizer distribution.

President Thieu, Vice President Nguyen Cao Ky and others in the Saigon government, by words and actions have displayed an enlightened attitude toward labor—prompted either by sincere philosophic motivation or a practical political awareness of CVT's growing power or a combination of the two. But this enlightenment does not permeate all layers of the bureaucracy.

Vestiges of colonial anti-unionism persist not only in government but also in the general society, steeped in the mandarinism of its past. Harsh illustrations can be seen in the jailing and harrassment of labor leaders.

After the Tet offensive, the CVT executive board, speaking through President Buu and Secretary General Tran Huu Quyen, denounced the Communists and appealed to union members to close ranks behind the government. Yet police held Quyen in "protective custody" immediately after the Viet Cong attacks. He was quickly released, however, in response to protests from CVT and its American friends, including AFL-CIO aides.

Just prior to Tet, Saigon police smashed a strike of electrical workers, who were protesting the refusal of the Saigon Electricity Company's new management to honor a contract negotiated with the previous owners. Union leaders were jailed but later released. Ultimate victory came to the strikers in mid-summer when a labor court ordered management to give them a retroactive 12 percent cost of living allowance.

The police breakup of the strike was reported in the American press, but not the labor court's ruling in favor of the strikers, which is an example of how good news from Viet Nam doesn't always get the same attention in the U.S. as bad news.

The jailings and the harassment are recurring reminders to South Vietnamese labor leaders of the unhappy past. CVT is vigilant in its efforts to curb overzealousness by government authorities in labor disputes. In its Labor Day statement last May 1, CVT emphasized that the republic's Constitution guarantees workers the right to strike.

Labor's friends in government recognize that it is within the framework of being a loyal opposition that CVT scolds some government policies and prods for more progress in social, economic and land reforms. Government allies of labor realize that CVT, as the one major group to have survived the past two decades of crises and war, is a force for national stability.

Farsighted and pragmatic government leaders are cognizant that CVT, led by men with a strong social conscience and possessing a nationwide apparatus, can be an effective ally in the government's stated policy of wanting "to win the minds and hearts of the people."

In Buu, government officials, including the 45-year-old Thieu and Ky, 40, see a man who, by virtue of his survival as CVT president for 20 years, is an elder statesman who has resources of wisdom that make his counsel worth seeking.

Because of his sagacity and his position as the broker of the largest power bloc in the country, Buu's influence with Thieu and Ky is said to be steadily rising. He is credited privately with having quietly mediated some of the differences between the two young officials whose ambitions make them personal rivals.

As Vietnamese workers meet the pressing problems of the wartime today and prepare for the hoped-for peace of tomorrow, a helping hand is being given them by the labor movements of other nations, especially the U.S.

Last spring, in accordance with resolutions adopted by the 1967 AFL-CIO convention and subsequent Executive Council sessions, a U.S. labor delegation went to Viet Nam to establish a relief program for war victims and to assist CVT in creating programs to develop a free and democratic labor movement. As a first move, nearly $30,000 in family relief was distributed to victims of the Tet offensive. To carry out the program of assisting the CVT, the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute opened an office in Saigon, headed by Fernand Audie of the Retail Clerks. He and his assistant. Len Yarborough of the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers, both have had extensive experience in helping labor movements in other countries.

Audie and Yarborough are concentrating on leadership development in CVT and creating cooperatives and credit unions among affiliated labor unions.

Audie spelled out the purpose of the AFL-CIO's overseas programs at a ceremony where he presented 10 hand-operated tractor-tillers to the Tenant Farmers. The machines are especially designed to function efficiently in the rice paddies. To make the program self-perpetuating, the Tenant Farmers formed a cooperative revolving fund into which recipients of the machines pay for them on a monthly basis, creating seed capital for purchasing more tractor-tillers. At the presentation ceremony, Audie said:

"The AFL-CIO, as the largest single organization in the United States supporting the Viet Nam policy of the U.S. Government, feels very strongly the urgent need to help further the development of a strong and democratic free trade union movement in Viet Nam, Asia and throughout the world. In this manner we hope to stir the minds and imaginations of men towards creating a world at peace which can only be brought about by achieving economic and social justice for the masses of the working people and adequately providing for the general welfare of all the citizens."

In addition to the AFL-CIO itself, a number of affiliated U.S. unions have contributed money and goods to aid the Vietnamese. The National Maritime Union sent its Far Eastern regional director, James F. Paterson, from Tokyo to Viet Nam with $2,000 for reconstruction of the labor center at Hue, badly damaged in the 25-day Tet battle for the old imperial city. The Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers Union has donated $30,000 raised from its members through in-plant solicitations to help CVT establish a refugee village in Dong Lac.

Emil G. Lindahl, labor advisor for the U.S. Agency for International Development Mission in South Viet Nam, would like to see more American unions contribute help to their brother unionists in other nations.

Lindahl, a former IUE leader in New York, has been with the State Department's AID operation for nearly a decade, three years of it in Viet Nam. Based on his experience in working with CVT, he says:

"The future of Viet Nam lies with labor. To communicate with the people, you need some sort of organization. And there it is: CVT, the one nonpartisan group that has survived Viet Nam's shifting political and social scene."

CVT survived its first two decades in part because it avoided partisan alliances with individual politicians. Buu knew that an alliance with any of them could mean the death-knell for CVT when that officeholder lost his grip on power.

But as democracy began to take root, Buu realized that the time had come for the labor movement to exert its latent power for the country's political good. Prior to the 1967 nationwide elections, CVT amended its constitution to remove a ban on political activity, a holdover from the colonial period when the French prohibited unions from involving themselves in politics. As Buu explained:

"The CVT is not entering politics for any political party, to seize power or to have positions in government. But given the danger the nation faces, we cannot close our eyes to let the others determine our destiny. The CVT is in politics for the nation and for its people."

Labor moved slowly and cautiously in the quicksand of Vietnamese politics. CVT started by urging its members to vote in the 1967 elections. It endorsed a slate of candidates for both houses of the constituent assembly, but refrained from backing any presidential hopeful. Its upper house slate won, but endorsed candidates in the lower house fared poorly.

CVT took its next major step in the spring of 1968, with Buu playing a key role in formation of the Association of Workers and Farmers, which he described as representing two groups that "are the majority of the Vietnamese and the victims of both Communists and corruption."

Then, in midsummer, with Buu again in a leadership role, the Association became the backbone of a new political party, the People's Alliance for Social Revolution, which is an amalgamation of about 30 political and religious splinter groups. PASR was formed on July 4 at a meeting attended by 600 representatives of the component groups. Buu successfully prevailed upon Thieu and Ky to visit the meeting.

Thieu hailed PASR's birth, praising its objectives of fighting poverty, disease, illiteracy, social injustice, corruption and militarism—goals also of CVT. It was in his address to the assembly that Thieu analyzed political parties of the past as being little more than a group of self-appointed big shots who believed the bombast of their own propaganda gave them popular power, but who lacked any participating membership among the masses. Thieu took favorable note of PASR plans to develop a deeprooted infrastructure so essential to a viable political party.

It is characteristic that Buu, though he was a prime mover of PASR's formation, holds no office in it. He prefers to work behind the scenes.

CVT headquarters, Saigon's labor temple, is now a focal point of PASR activity, which centers around political training classes, with each of the participating groups sending members there for leadership training. Or what is called cadre training in Viet Nam.

Now that Buu has made CVT the Adam's rib of an ambitious effort to create a national political party pursuing the same goals that CVT strives for, his influence in South Viet Nam can be expected to steadily increase. Foremost of his hopes for his country, of course, is a desire for peace.

A hope for peace is uppermost in any view of the future in Viet Nam, where war has sown its ruin and grief for nearly 30 years and where North and South have been partitioned for 14 years.

As one Vietnamese labor leader expressed it: "We want a bowl of rice, a roof over our heads and to live with our families in peace."

Buu sees a glimmer of hope for peace in the Paris talks, but is skeptical of the North's sincerity. To those in the U.S. who say that South Viet Nam should agree to the North's insistence on a coalition government in Saigon, one that includes the North's puppet group, the National Liberation Front (Viet Cong), Buu says: "The CVT is ready to accept a coalition government in South Viet Nam if the Communists will accept a coalition in North Viet Nam." Based on his knowledge of the North's oppression of labor and its suppression of unions, Buu does not believe the North's government is truly representative of its people.

Buu wants more than an end to hostilities, however. In addition to peace, he wants reunification of Viet Nam.

As a first step, when and if peace comes, the CVT leader proposes maintenance of the governments of North and South under United Nations' control, "with the people of both zones having the right to move to one or the other." Later, he hopes to see a referendum under UN auspices throughout North and South "to enable the Vietnamese people to choose the type of government which would suit them and at the same time to reunify the country."

Who would win such a referendum?

CVT President Tran Quoc Buu and General Secretary Tran Huu Quyen answer that question in these words: "By experience, we are sure that the Communists can never win any election in any part of the free world."

They hope that such a reunification referendum would lead to:

"A sacred peace capable of conquering the animal instinct in man and of leading him to live as a man, with his family, in his shop and with his neighbors, in a truly free, progressive national community, conforming to the principles of modern humanism."

Rx for a Sick, Flabby Government

By Peter F. Drucker

Drucker is on the graduate faculty of New York University. The following article is excerpted by permission from his book "The Age of Discontinuity," published last week by Harper & Row.

GOVERNMENT SURELY has never been more prominent than today. The most despotic government of 1900 would not have dared probe into the private affairs of its citizens as income tax collectors now do routinely in the freest society.

Even the czar's secret police did not go in for the security investigations we now take for granted. Nor could any bureaucrat of 1900 have imagined the questionnaires that governments now expect businesses, universities or citizens to fill out in ever-mounting number and ever-increasing detail. At the same time, government has everywhere become the largest employer in the society.

Government is certainly all-pervasive. But is it truly strong? Or is it only big?

There is mounting evidence that government is big rather than strong; that it is fat and flabby rather than powerful; that it costs a great deal but does not achieve much. There is mounting evidence also that the citizen less and less believes in government and is increasingly disenchanted with it. Indeed, government is sick—and just at the time when we need a strong, healthy, and vigorous government.

There is obviously little respect for government among the young—but the adults, the taxpayers, are also increasingly disenchanted. They want still more services from government. But they are everywhere approaching the point where they balk at paying for a bigger government, even though they may still want what government promises to give.

Members of the Civilian Conservation Corps at work in the 1930s. "When the Great Depression hit . . . everyone immediately turned to government as the savior . . . But now our attitudes are in transition. We are rapidly moving to doubt and distrust of government . . ."

Love Affair Ended

THE DISENCHANTMENT with government cuts across national boundaries and ideological lines. It is as prevalent in Communist as in democratic societies, as common in white as in nonwhite countries. This disenchantment may well be the most profound discontinuity in the world around us. It marks a sharp change in mood and attitude between this generation and its predecessors.

For 70 years or so—from the 1890s to the 1960s—mankind, especially in the developed countries, was hypnotized by government. We were in love with it and saw no limits to its abilities or to its good intentions.

Rarely has there been a more torrid political love affair than that between government and the generations that reached manhood between 1918 and 1960. Anything that anyone felt needed doing during this period was to be turned over to government—and this, everyone seemed to believe, made sure that the job was already done.

The Fabians in Great Britain or the German Social Democrats started their love affair with government before 1900. It became general with World War 1, when government, using taxation and the printing press, mobilized social resources way beyond what anyone earlier would have thought possible. When the Great Depression hit, a decade later, everyone immediately turned to government as the savior.

It is pathetic to recall the naive beliefs that prevailed in the late 1930s—such, for instance, as was preached in one of the best-sellers of the depression years, "To Plan or Not to Plan," by the British Labor economist Barbara Wooton. The book's author, honored by the British government with a life peerage as Lady Wooton, is still alive and active, but nothing is more remote from us today, or less appealing, than the messianic innocence of this fervent love letter to government.

All it says, and it says it on every page, is: "Utopia is here—all that's needed is to take everything away from the wicked, selfish interests and to turn it over to government." World War II reinforced this belief. Again, government proved itself incredibly effective in organizing the energies of society for warfare.

But now our attitudes are in transition. We are rapidly moving to doubt and distrust of government and, in the case of the young, even to rebellion against it. We still, if only out of habit, turn social tasks over to government. We still revise unsuccessful programs over and over again, and assert that nothing is wrong with them that a change in procedures or a "competent administrator" will not cure. But we no longer really believe these promises when we reform a bungled program for the third time.

Who, for instance, any longer believes that administrative changes in the foreign aid program of the United States (or of the United Nations) will really produce rapid worldwide development? Who really believes that the War on Poverty will vanquish poverty in the cities? Who in France believes that one more commission on administrative reform will really change the system? Or who in Russia really believes that a new program of incentives will make the collective farm productive?

We still repeat the slogans of yesteryear. Indeed, we still act on them. But we no longer believe in them. We no longer expect results from government. What was torrid romance between the people and government for so very long has now become a tired, middle-aged liaison which we do not quite know how to break off but which only becomes exacerbated by being dragged out.

What explains this disenchantment with government?

We expected miracles—and that always produces disillusionment. Government, it was widely believed (though only subconsciously), would produce a great many things for nothing. Cost was thought to be a function of who did something rather than of what was being attempted. There is little doubt, for instance, that the British, in adopting the "free health service," believed that medical care would cost nothing.

All that such a health service can be, of course, is a form of "prepaid" medical care. Nurses, doctors, hospitals, drugs and so on have to be paid for by somebody. But everybody expected this "somebody" to be somebody else.

At the least, everyone expected that under a "free" health service, the taxes of the rich would pay for the health care of the poor. But there never are enough rich people around to carry the burden of any general service.

All such plans are, in effect, taxation and compulsory saving that force the individal to pay for something whether he wants it or not. This is their whole rationale, and it is not necessarily a bad rationale. But the illusion persisted that government could somehow make costs go away and produce a great deal for nothing—or at the expense of only an affluent minority.

Automatically Correct

THIS BELIEF has been, in effect, only one facet of a much more general illusion from which the educated and the intellectuals in particular have suffered: that by turning tasks over to government, conflict and decision would be made to go away.

Once the "wicked private interests" had been eliminated, a decision as to the right course of action would be rational and automatic. There would be neither selfishness nor political passion. Belief in government was thus largely a romantic escape from politics and from responsibility.

One root of this argument was a hatred of business, of profit and, above all, of wealth. That motives other than the desire for monetary gain could underlie self-interest and that values other than financial values could

It became general with World War 1, when government, using taxation and the printing press, mobilized social resources way beyond what anyone earlier would have thought possible. When the Great Depression hit, a decade later, everyone immediately turned to government as the savior.

It is pathetic to recall the naive beliefs that prevailed in the late 1930s—such, for instance, as was preached in one of the best-sellers of the depression years, "To Plan or Not to Plan," by the British Labor economist Barbara Wooton. The book's author, honored by the British government with a life peerage as Lady Wooton, is still alive and active, but nothing is more remote from us today, or less appealing, than the messianic innocence of this fervent love letter to government.

All it says, and it says it on every page, is: "Utopia is here—all that's needed is to take everything away from the wicked, selfish interests and to turn it over to government." World War II reinforced this belief. Again, government proved itself incredibly effective in organizing the energies of society for warfare.

But now our attitudes are in transition. We are rapidly moving to doubt and distrust of government and, in the case of the young, even to rebellion against it. We still, if only out of habit, turn social tasks over to government. We still revise unsuccessful programs over and over again, and assert that nothing is wrong with them that a change in procedures or a "competent administrator" will not cure. But we no longer really believe these promises when we reform a bungled program for the third time.

Who, for instance, any longer believes that administrative changes in the foreign aid program of the United States (or of the United Nations) will really produce rapid worldwide development? Who really believes that the War on Poverty will vanquish poverty in the cities? Who in France believes that one more commission on administrative reform will really change the system? Or who in Russia really believes that a new program of incentives will make the collective farm productive?

We still repeat the slogans of yesteryear. Indeed, we still act on them. But we no longer believe in them. We no longer expect results from government. What was torrid romance between the people and government for so very long has now become a tired, middle-aged liaison which we do not quite know how to break off but which only becomes exacerbated by being dragged out.

THIS BELIEF has been, in effect, only one facet of a much more general illusion from which the educated and the intellectuals in particular have suffered: that by turning tasks over to government, conflict and decision would be made to go away.

Once the "wicked private interests" had been eliminated, a decision as to the right course of action would be rational and automatic. There would be neither selfishness nor political passion. Belief in government was thus largely a romantic escape from politics and from responsibility.

One root of this argument was a hatred of business, of profit and, above all, of wealth. That motives other than the desire for monetary gain could underlie self-interest and that values other than financial values could

Pueblo Skipper's 152-Minute Ordeal

By George C. Wilson
Washington Post Staff Writer

CORONADO, Calif.—The legal fate of Cmdr. Lloyd M. Bucher of the USS Pueblo hangs on the way the Navy interprets three words in its regulations: "power to resist."

In two weeks of testimony before five admirals sitting here as a naval court of inquiry, Bucher has contended he did not have the power to resist the North Koreans who snatched his ship away on the high seas Jan. 23, 1968.

So far, his story of how he became the first skipper in more than 150 years to surrender his ship without firing a shot has held up well. But starting Monday, the court will hear from other members of the 83-man crew and there have been rumors, though only rumors, that some of Bucher's officers did not want to give up the Pueblo. Bucher is confident, however, that his crew will back him up by agreeing that there was no choice.

Navy regulation 0730 states: "The commanding officer shall not permit his command to be searched by any person representing a foreign state nor permit any of the personnel under his command to be removed from the command by such person so long as he has the power to resist."

"Cmdr. Bucher," his attorney, E. Miles Harvey, asked in court, "at the time the North Koreans set foot on your ship, did you any longer have the power to resist?"

"No, I did not," Bucher replied.

What follows is Bucher's own story of his 152-minute ordeal. The unattributed quotations are his.

"AT ABOUT 1200 [noon] or a few minutes thereafter, we sighted the SO-1," a North Korean subchaser. QM 1/c Charles B. Law Jr. said that "we were between 15 and 18 miles from the nearest land, Ung Do Island. We were laying to, attempting to collect electronic intelligence."

The subchaser circled the Pueblo at a range of 500 to 1000 yards, giving the spy ship a thorough scrutiny. The Pueblo was flying no American flag at the time. Its white numbers, GER-2, had not been painted out.

"After a minute of circling, the SO-1 asked, 'What nationality?,' through the international code of signals flag hoist. 'My response to this signal was to hoist the U.S. flag, my ensign. And I noticed a great deal of activity aboard the SO-1.

"I expected that we might have this SO-1 for company for the remainder of the time that we would be in the area and that he would perform in the fashion of other ships that had tailed the Banner [the Pueblo's sister ship] on several of her missions . . . I did, however, plan to report the incidents, particularly in view of the fact that all of his guns were manned. But I figured that this was nothing more than harassment and something that was intended to intimidate me, and to intimidate the ship."

A Scientific Guise

TO DISGUISE the Pueblo's real purpose and also to assert its rights to the high seas, Bucher had raised the flags on his ship indicating that hydrographic operations were under way. He also ordered the oceanographer to conduct a Nansen cast: heaving over the side a string of bottles attached to a cable. The bottles are opened after the weighted line hits the bottom; they fill with water at various depths and take its temperature.

"The SO-1 hoisted the international code signal, 'Heave to or I will fire' . . . I was already lying dead in the water . . . I answered back, 'I'm in international waters.' This exchange took place on the SO-1's third circle of the Pueblo. The subchaser was flying pennant No. 35."

At 12:10 p.m., according to a radio message intercepted by U. S. intelligence, the North Korean subchaser radioed its superiors: "The name of the target is GER-2. I judge it to be a reconnaissance ship. It is American guys. It does not appear that there are weapons, and it is a hydrographic mapping ship." The subchaser had seen the hydrographic flags.

At 12:52, the Pueblo radioed its superiors at U. S. Naval Forces Japan (headquartered at Yokosuka). Air Force Lt. Gen. George Brown, who looked into the Pueblo incident for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told Congress last February that the Pueblo's 52-minute delay in reporting the "heave to" order "indicates that she wasn't particularly disturbed by this challenge." Bucher testified that he raised the precedence of his 12:52 p.m. message from "flash" to "critical," "which would permit the message to go immediately and straight to the White House in addition to all the addressees."

He had an open radio line to Japan at the while, in contrast to the previous day, when he said it took him 12 to 14 hours to make contact with his home command.

AT 1 P.M. Korean time, the seagoing game of chicken in international waters off Wonsan escalated. Three North Korean torpedo boats, armed with light machine guns as well as torpedoes, sped from the direction of Wonsan to join the subchaser harassing the Pueblo—still dead in the water. The torpedoes were still in their covers but the deck guns were manned. Also, Bucher said, two Korean fighter planes, which he believed were Mig-21s, circled overhead.

"The P-4s (torpedo boats) closed and stationed themselves [illegible] the ship at a range of between [illegible]00 yards, sometimes getting in [illegible] as 25 yards . . . Attempting [illegible] my 50-caliber machine guns and breaking out my 45s (pistols on board) would only have given them perhaps an excuse to

Our Mideast Policy Is Archaic Colonial

By Abdul Aziz Said

Said is professor of international relations in the American University School of International Service.

THE RECORD of American foreign policy in the Middle East over the last two decades is a catalogue of failures. The principal cause of this unhappy performance is that the basic assumptions from which U.S. foreign policy proceeded are no longer—and perhaps never were—in tune with contemporary Middle Eastern realities.

The American Middle Eastern policy of recent tradition can simply, but accurately, be described as anticommunist in its approach to the major objective: the guarantee of Israeli and Arab territorial integrity. But today this approach is clearly counterproductive; it both perpetuates intraregional tensions and exacerbates regional hostilities.

As a foreign policy style, anticommunism is particularly inappropriate to the Middle East because, beyond clan loyalites, no ideology, including Islam and the more recently developed pan-Arabism and Arab socialism, has stimulated an enthusiastic, sustained popular response. Middle Eastern Communist parties are notoriously weak in terms of real political power. The American anti-communist approach has resulted in a divided region, with reactionary, often monarchist, U.S.-supported client states in complex confrontation with revolutionary, populist, essentially nonaligned states which tend to gravitate toward the Soviet Union.

Similarly, the American objective of guaranteed Israeli and Arab frontiers merely reinforces Israel's overwhelmingly centripetal isolation. It has allowed the Israelis the luxury of ignoring the several compelling reasons for them to adjust to the realities of their Middle Eastern environment. The stubborn American commitment to Israel has, at the same time, provided the Arabs with scapegoat—"Zionist-American imperialism"—on which to blame all the ills of the Arab world.

The Colonial Style

BOTH THE United States and the Soviet Union were pulled into the power vacuum created by the withdrawal of the colonial powers from the Middle East; both feel compelled to define and pursue exclusive, if not conflicting, interests in the region. But, especially since the declining importance of the Suez Canal, neither set of interests is supported by vital and historically permanent principles of foreign policy.

The United States has chosen to pursue vaguely defined interests from Vietnam to Suez in much the same style as the colonial powers of the 19th century. Such behavior raises the question: Can today's great powers legitimately claim interests identical with the great power interests of the colonial era?

As in Southeast Asia and the Far East, Soviet Middle Eastern interests are manifested in a pattern of increasing response to an expanding American influence in the area. Russian interests in the defense of her own Middle Eastern real estate and, to a lesser extent, in the strategic value of the Persian Gulf oil reserves are intense. Nonetheless, the goals of Soviet policy in the Middle East are essentially limited.

In the classical balance-of-power system, strategic interests could be achieved only by the maintenance of local forces in being. Similar results are possible in today's world, dominated as it is by the superpowers, without the permanent presence of power. This concept takes on added significance in the Middle Eastern context.

In the classical system, Napoleon's Egyptian campaign was intended to secure protection against other European powers rather than to expand the perimeter of French influence. In the present international system, U.S. strategic interests must be determined not by the presence of power but by the power of influence. In today's world, where it is possible for the two superpowers to confront each other from within their own territories, it is increasingly difficult for them to justify their presence in such areas as the Middle East, where the presence of a great power is immediately taken to imply ambition rather than charity.

Both Sides Vulnerable

AT A TIME when defense technology was less advanced, the Middle East was of immense strategic importance to the United States. Strategic bases were built there to allow for a variety of American routes of attack on the Soviet Union and to protect ourselves from medium-range Soviet bombers. Our presence was designed to counter rather than exert local influence.

Despite the fact that the United States and the Soviet Union are now

Pigs, Now, Get Balanced Diets

By Arnold E. Schaefer

Dr. Schaefer is the Department of Health, Education and Welfare nutritionist in charge of the National Nutrition Survey ordered by Congress in late 1967. The following is excerpted from his preliminary report to the Senate's Select Committee on Nutrition and Related Human needs.

THE PRELIMINARY DATA clearly indicate an alarming prevalence of those characteristics that are associated with undernourished groups. Our studies to date clearly indicate that there is malnutrition, and in our opinion it occurs in an unexpected large proportion of our sample population [12,000 mainly poor persons in Texas, Louisiana, Kentucky and New York].

Inadequate nutrient intake, if prolonged, results in weakness, fatigue and inability to carry out the simplest tasks, and in its extreme form leads to starvation and death. Nutrient deficiency manifests itself in retarded growth in the young child. Of special concern to us is so-called "hidden hunger," in which the individual may not recognize any particular symptom but has such low nutrient tissue levels that if he is subjected to stress such as hard physical labor or disease, his physiological functional performance is reduced and eventually the physical manifestations of malnutrition will appear.

The preschool child from the time of weaning until approximately 6 years of age is the most vulnerable to malnutrition. His wellbeing is dependent upon the knowledge and capability of the mother to feed him properly, protect his health and supply clothing and shelter. The problems of malnutrition are definitely associated with other health, education, social and economic problems.

In general, the most widespread nutritional problem is one of multiple deficiency of one or more nutrients such as protein, vitamins, minerals and calories. It is shocking to realize that the problems in the poverty groups in the United States seem to be very similar to those we have encountered in the developing countries. The overall health status is better here, however, probably due to the better environmental sanitation (pure water, safe food supply and waste disposal systems). Also, medical care, though limited in many areas, is still more available in the United States than in the developing countries.

Height and weight measurements for age provide the simplest means we have for assessing early growth status. Our data seem to indicate that we do have growth retardation in the 1-to-6-year-old child.

In addition to the growth curves figure, we have preliminary evidence of this retardation from wrist bone X-ray analyses. Analyses of a very small number (120) of X-rays from children reveal retarded bone growth in 3.5 per cent. Of even greater consequence are the undetected detrimental effects of early malnutrition on the learning ability, mental and neurological capacity and behavior of children who survive impaired physical growth.

All essential nutrients must be provided to ensure optimal growth and development. Our findings on the high prevalence of anemia and of reduced levels of serum albumin, vitamin A, vitamin C and urinary riboflavin clearly indicate the seriousness and magnitude of the hunger problem.

A diet with only one nutrient restricted at a suboptimal level is reflected in reduced tissue stores in chickens, rats, dogs, pigs and other animals and results first in retardation of growth. Such animals may continue to live and grow at a slow rate, but they are not productive from an economic standpoint.

The American farmer or pet owner need not worry about the nutritional adequacy of formulated animal feed because it has adequate levels of all nutrients. This is not the case for man. Our diets are based on our knowledge of what food will provide the required nutrients, on customs, personal preference and cost. Lack of knowledge of food needs, or insufficient money to purchase food, can result in a poor diet and lead to malnutrition.

To date, we have found seven cases which the physician diagnoses as severe malnutrition using such terms as kwashiorkor (severe protein and multiple nutrient deficiency) and marasmus, primarily a caloric deficiency. We did not expect to find such cases in the United States. In the majority of these cases, a contributing factor was a lack of knowledge on the part of the mother, often complicated by infectious disease or diarrhea.

Of primary concern to those of our group who have worked in the international field was that nonfat dry milk which had vitamins A and D removed was distributed under the food commodity program to American poverty groups. In 1965, our office was instrumental in having AID and the Agriculture Department fortify nonfat dry milk with vitamins A and D before it was shipped overseas. It was not until the fall of 1968 that nonfat dry milk was fortified for use in food donation programs in the United States. Much of the data we are reporting here is based on studies of family groups made from July through November of 1968.

Unless you happen to be an individual who requires surgery for an enlarged thyroid or goiter due to iodine deficiency, a discussion of this problem evokes little response even among the medical profession. Over 30 years ago, the United States was one of the first countries to launch a large-scale program to eradicate goiter by promulgating the use of iodized salt. Yet our findings to date indicate that in the areas where we have worked, approximately 5 per cent of the population has goiter.

This is not a money problem; it can be prevented for less than one-fourth of a cent per person per year. But in many areas of the United States, iodized salt is not even available for man.

High Rate of Anemia

OUR DATA to date show that 15 per cent of the population had hemoglobin levels less than acceptable, which means they were candidates for medical treatment for anemia. Anemia is not restricted to low-income groups: the data suggest that its prevalence may have remained the same over the past 30 years. But in the impoverished population, this problem may actually be on the increase.

The fact that we have discovered cases of rickets again alerts us to the reality that we cannot ignore public health nutrition programs once they are started. This disease was virtually eradicated over 30 years ago through the simple mechanism of fortifying milk with vitamin D at no cost to the consumer. If you will check the price of vitamin D milk and other milk in the Washington area today, you will be surprised at the difference.

One of the greatest rewards my staff and I have received is the sincere cooperation of the state and local levels of health, education, welfare and agricultural personnel. These offcials are anxious to define the problems, assess their local resources and proceed with corrective and preventive measures.

Texas and Louisiana are already reviewing their educational curricula to strengthen health study units and incorporate additional units with emphasis on nutrition. They are reviewing procedures to get to the mother of the prekindergarten child, to operate the school lunch program as a means of more than just feeding the children once a day and to improve breakfast programs.

The one clear-cut point that stands out is the need for improved education in nutrition, health and family planning for the mother, the future mother now in school and every other person concerned with purchasing food.

Texas and Louisiana are reviewing their school lunch programs to make them do more than simply feed children once a day.

The Politics of Hunger

By Victor Cohn

Washington Post Staff Writer

HUNGER has politics.

A Senate select committee created to try to answer the question, "Is there hunger in America?," heard that there are indeed "malnutrition," "undernutrition" and "hidden hunger" (meaning body tissues starved for nutrients despite bellies more or less filled with wrong foods).

There are "alarming," "surprising" conditions among the poor in Texas, Louisiana and other states so far surveyed, said a Public Health Service report. Children are stunted and sick.

Senators listened. Then some began asking the question: "What is the cause?"

Is it mainly poverty? Or is it mainly ignorance?

The answer—an answer that may not be fully available for many months—will have great political significance. For it will say either, "All we have to do is educate and inform the poor to buy some tomatoes as well as rice and beans." Or: "We can't wipe out hunger and malnutrition without wiping out poverty and all that goes with it, including ignorance."

Keen awareness of the issue became apparent on the days devoted to the early results of this first National Nutrition Survey. Dr. Arnold E. Schaefer, a spunky little HEW nutritionist and head of the survey, was testifying. Sen. Allen Ellender of Louisiana—where 40 per cent of 3000 Headstart children were found to be anemic for lack of dietary iron—kept boring in.

"I assume in the end we'll be able to find the real cause," he said . . . "What is the reason?" . . . "Personally, I feel a good deal of it is due to lack of knowledge on the part of mothers. I'm sure some is due to inability to buy foods." And again: "Would you say that a good deal is due to lack of knowledge in mothers and fathers?"

A good deal of it is indeed due to lack of knowledge, Schaefer agreed. But "our data to date"—like all data ever collected on this vast human problem—show that lack of income and ignorance "are closely related" and in fact interwoven.

The next day, Dr. Walter Unglaub of Tulane University, directing the Louisiana part of the study, was less definite. First, he said, "Part of it is economic, but I think it is mostly ignorance." Then he downgraded ignorance to "a major factor" and conceded that most of the nutritional problem will be found among the poor.

There was ample testimony from every witness that far more nutritional education is sorely needed. Food alone will never be enough. The poor of St. Charles Parish, La., lack vitamin C but ignore cheap greens and tomatoes in local markets.

There was also ample testimony, however, that malnutrition stunts both physical and mental growth. And no one plugging education quite answered the question: "How do you teach a 19-year-old mother, herself mentally crippled as a child by ill feeding, to give her child more scientific nutrition?"

turn from what might be glossed over into a full-blown incident."

Apparently unknown to Bucher at the time, U.S. intelligence had intercepted a 1:06 p.m. message from the subchaser to shore that she intended to board the Pueblo and tow her into Wonsan.

"I never considered that I would ever be attacked on this mission. It never occurred to me. I had read nothing, nothing in the many Banner reports, and I believe that there were ten of them. Nor had I received any briefings at any station along the way during my period as prospective commanding officer or after I was commanding officer—and the many briefings I received from people at CINPACFleet (Commander in Chief, Pacific Fleet) and in Japan—that would indicate that there was any danger of my ever coming under attack."

Koreans Converse

THE SUBCHASER sent another signal which Bucher translated as: "Follow in my wake. I have a pilot aboard." The subchaser and one of the PT boats conferred by semaphore and megaphone after this signal went up, apparently deciding how to force the Pueblo to follow them into Wonsan. PT boat No. 4 then backed toward the starboard bow area of the Pueblo with a boarding party on deck.

"I said on the bridge (when he saw the boarding party coming toward the Pueblo), I would be damned if they were going to get away with that, so I got under way and proceeded out to sea, and asked the navigator for the best course to open land . . . He recommended 080 . . . As I was departing the area, I also hoisted a flag with the intention of confusing the SO-1: 'Thank you for your consideration. I am departing the area.' I should have filled my yardarm with flags that said absolutely nothing and let them fiddle around for some time . . . I thought just sending them something would cool them off a little bit.

"I started off at one-third speed in order to leave the area in as dignified a way as I possibly could. I did not want to appear to be panicky . . . I went at one-third speed in order to present a dignified departure from a rather tight situation."

By using right full rudder as he got under way, Bucher broke up the initial boarding attempt. A second subchaser came on the scene and then left, but the PT boats stayed with him. A fourth had come on the scene. They kept close in on the Pueblo—one on each bow and one on each beam—as Bucher made a wide circle and headed out toward deep water.

Bucher had ordered his crew to prepare to destroy classified material aboard. "I didn't know but that I might be able to get away by running out to sea. I still had not been fired upon . . . I did not consider that I had enough positive information as to what was going to happen eventually . . . that I should order emergency destruction at that time."

"I was able to open the SO-1 to a range of something between 2000 and 3000 yards before she did anything else. I was, however, being constantly harassed by the P-4s. The one P-4 which was on my starboard quarter was the only P-4 to uncover a torpedo tube and train it in my direction. Otherwise, I was merely being held under the sights of the machine guns, which were deck mounted.

"The SO-1 was still lying back and was getting farther and farther behind me. About the time we had opened the range to him to approximately 3000 yards. . . . he opened on my port quarter in order apparently to gain a tactical advantage of being able to bring his guns to bear on at least as much of my ship as possible . . .

"He was running at a speed of 20 to 25 knots in order to close me. As he commenced closing, he raised the signal again: 'Heave to or I will fire on you.' I ignored this signal and continued to run at full speed. . . ."

'Request Help. SOS'

AT 1:27 P.M., as U.S. intelligence officers were to report later, the North Korean sub chaser ordered the four torpedo boats to get out of the way so she could fire at the fleeing Pueblo. At 1:28 p.m., the Pueblo radioed: "The North Koreans plan to open fire. . . . Initiating emergency destruction of classified equipment. Request help. SOS."

This was the message that Rear Adm. Frank L. Johnson's headquarters back in Japan was to find itself unable to respond to for lack of ships or planes in the right place.

"At a range of 1500 to 2000 yards, the SO-1 opened up on me and fired the first salvo. Each salvo contained between six and 14 individual shells."

Some of the PT boats—Bucher said he did not know how many—were firing away at the Pueblo at the same time with what he guessed were 30-caliber machine guns. "I could see the dents being made as the machine guns raked the side of the ship, but very few of those penetrated."

One of the shells from the first salvo of 57-millimeter (Bucher judged they were that size) exploded near Bucher on the flying bridge. The fragments wounded Bucher, Signalman 1/c Wendell G. Leach and Communications Technician 3/c Steven J. Robin—all of whom were on the bridge.

The explosion knocked Bucher down. He had one painful fragment in his buttocks and seven more in his ankle area. But none of the men was put out of action by his wounds. Bucher said he got back up on his feet and ordered the destruction of the classified equipment aboard.

A Smaller Target

"AFTER THE first salvo was fired, I continued to open the coast on a course of approximately 080, although I had come slightly to the right and was perhaps at that time on a course of about 100 degrees in an attempt to place the SO-1 more directly astern of me in order that I would present as small a target angle as possible. He continued to open to the east and, having much greater speed than I had, he was able to position himself once again out on my port quarter . . .

"After about the third salvo, it occurred to me that most of the firing was being directed toward my flying bridge . . . The SO-1 had closed by this time to a range of approximately 900 yards on my port quarter . . . He was continuing to close and therefore was firing at what I would consider a point-blank range."

Bucher said he therefore decided to go down to the pilot house by an exposed ladder on the starboard side. A torpedo boat 40 yards off the starboard quarter spotted him and opened fire. The bullets missed him. Leach and Robin, rather than risk that fire, jumped down from the flying bridge to the pilot house level.

Problem of Destruction

BUCHER HAD ordered a modified general quarters—ordering all his men except those burning secret papers to stay off the decks and inside the ship where the machine gun bullets could not reach them. The torpedo boats had forced him away from his seaward course to a bearing more toward land of 140 degrees. He said this kept him from getting to 600-foot-deep water, the required depth for dumping classified equipment over the side.

He said he was worried about everybody getting killed or the ship being sunk in shallow water—alternatives which would have given the Koreans the secret equipment largely intact. He said he decided to stop his "high-speed" run to see if the firing would stop so his crew could concentrate on destroying secret equipment He raised the flags protesting the firing and brought the Pueblo to a full stop under the guns of the sub chaser and four PT boats.

"We continued to destroy classified material" while the ship was stopped. The firing had stopped as well. "I decided at that time that if the destruction of classified material was progressing successfully, and depending upon what their next action would be, that I would surrender the ship."

Pistols Over Side

AFTER LEAVING the pilot house to make sure no secret papers were there, and throwing his personal pistols over the side so the Koreans would not get them, Bucher said he went back up to the bridge. The sub chaser was lying to about 800 yards away from the Pueblo. It had hoisted the signal, "Follow me, I have a pilot aboard." This was apparently about 1:40 p.m.

At 1:45 p.m., the Pueblo radioed shore that "we are being escorted into probable Wonsan." Bucher said he followed the sub chaser as slowly as possible to buy maximum time to destroy secret equipment. The sub chaser pulled about 3000 yards ahead of the Pueblo. The PT boats surrounded the Pueblo close in, motioning Bucher to speed up. He said he pretended not to understand and kept going at one-third speed.

Once again Bucher became worried about whether the classified material would be destroyed before the Pueblo tied up at Wonsan. He stopped the ship again to buy time. A torpedo boat radioed the Pueblo's all-stop to the sub chaser. It returned to a range of 2000 yards and opened fire again. One shell from this salvo hit Fireman Duane D. Hodges in the right hip, practically blowing his leg off and destroying much of his lower stomach region. Hodges died from his wounds.

"It became apparent to me at this time, and it was my considered opinion, that to continue to remain stopped as I was would only invite additional firing and would in all probability give us less of an opportunity to complete the destruction which was going on at the time. So I ordered the ship ahead one-third . . . and we continued to follow the SO-1 in."

This second stopping of the Pueblo was probably between 1:45 and 2:10 p.m., because it was in that interval that the ship radioed to Japan: "Have three wounded and one man with leg blown off. Have not used any weapons nor uncovered 50-caliber machine guns. Destroying all (deleted from public transcript) and as much electrical equipment as possible. How about some help? These guys mean business. Do not intend to offer any resistance."

Bucher kept following the subchaser into Wonsan. He was ordered to stop at 2:32 p.m. It was apparently at this time that the North Koreans boarded the Pueblo. It was still in international waters, even outside the 12-mile limit claimed by North Korea—according to Navy officials. At 5 p.m., the Pueblo was still 6½ nautical miles outside Wonsan Harbor.

Bucher estimates that the North Koreans tied his ship up in Wonsan about 8:30 p.m. Destruction of classified materials had not been completed.

Philanthropy by rich young men is a growing trend, and two of the best-known examples are Stewart Rawlings Mott, 31-year-old heir to General Motors millions, and Martin Peretz, 29-year-old assistant professor of social studies at Harvard. Both are involved in liberal or leftist causes. Both gave generously to the presidential campaign of Sen. Eugene McCarthy. But there the similarities end. Washington Post Staff Writer Leroy F. Aarons interviewed both men and associates of each. He found that few people are so different in temperament, background and motivation as Stewart Mott and Martin Peretz.

Mott: "People who give money ought not to do so quietly if they want to get leverage . . . Besides, if a person does something he believes in, he should be proud of it."

Peretz:

"I've let myself in for being a public man and don't want to be. I was in the airport yesterday and I was recognized. It was terrifying."

The Boston Globe

Two Rich Young Activists

NEW YORK—"At a cocktail party before the [McCarthy] rally, I began to tremble, and I went over and wrote a check," said Stewart Rawlings Mott in a May, 1968, Village Voice interview. ". . . Then at the rally when the Rev. Howard Moody was speaking, I passed a note to him via Tony Randall. He read it and first he mouthed words, speechless in astonishment, then he did a war dance and announced the gift."

Comments Parker Donham, a Harvard undergraduate who was Eugene McCarthy's press secretary: "Mott? Good God! What kind of a guy wants to stand up before 20,000 people at Madison Square Garden and announce that he's giving away thousands and thousands of dollars?"

Which would seem a rather ungenerous attitude toward someone who gave $50,000 to the McCarthy cause at that rally, was later to add $160,000 and raised several thousand more for the hard-pressed campaign. But it's a good question, nonetheless.

Mott comes to philanthropy as to the manner born. He is the son of Charles Stewart Mott of Flint, Mich., the nonagenarian senior board mem-jobs, then settled into a career of giving away money.

His choice of charities, again, is in sharp contrast to his father's style. The elder Mott has a foundation with $430 million in assets, the income from which goes entirely to the Flint school system. Stewart's charities, to which he devotes about half his annual income of $1 million, run the gamut from population control to psychic phenomena to peacenik politics. They seem almost designed to shock the old man.

Intelligent Nonintellectual

PERSONALLY, Mott, a bachelor, is a mix of up-tight charm and independence, with a substantial dash of eccentricity. Tall (6 feet 2) burly (190 pounds) and good-looking (a female aide says he has been taken for both Warren Beatty and Robert Kennedy), Mott is highly intelligent, but no intellectual heavyweight.

His philanthropy, while consistently liberal, has no deep-seated philosophic base (he supported Rockefeller, switched to McCarthy and finally voted for Humphrey). It is for him a vocation, a form of expression and ful-and investments (of which Mott has a respectable portfolio).

Mott, who delivers all this in a low-keyed, carefully controlled monotone, like an announcer reporting a golf match, has a favorite charity—Planned Parenthood, to which he has given $1.2 million over the last five years.

Second to population control, he is interested in arms control and peace causes. But it was his public leap into politics last year that brought him widespread attention. In March, 1968, he impulsively placed two full-page ads in the New York Times, The Washington Post and eight Michigan newspapers pledging $50,000 to Nelson Rockefeller if readers would double the amount with contributions.

Mott, who travels either by bicycle or in a second hand 1966, non-General Motors Volkswagen, recalls how it happened:

"I was driving my car and was thinking about this play I had just seen, 'The Trojan Woman,' by Giradoux. It's a very strong anti-war play. I went home and couldn't sleep. So I got up and started blocking out this ad, which appeared the following Sunday."

drifted into the more receptive McCarthy camp after the sensational New Hampshire victory. After his Garden rally gambit, he was made special gifts chairman, and claims to have raised $1.5 million for the McCarthy cause.

A Determined Small Boy

MOTT'S CONTROLLED CHARM sometimes gives way in the privacy of board rooms. Once he angrily pulled his money out of a group he had been helping when it would not go along with his ideas.

Says one person who has observed Mott in an adversary situation: "Sometimes he seemed like a small boy determined to get his way, and if he didn't he would stomp out of the room."

Mott's seeming penchant for publicity leads many to take him less than completely seriously, a fact that causes him no little pain. He points out that most of his work for peace, population control and the arts is done with little fanfare.

But public exposure holds no fears for Stewart Mott.

BOSTON—Where Stewart Mott is all charm, Martin Peretz is intense, brooding and, by the account of his associates, capable of at least the appearance of arrogance.

Although born of a well-to-do New York family, he was an intellectual, a teacher and an activist before he became a giver.

Most of his philanthropy is in conjunction with his second wife, a retiring, publicity-shy descendant of the Singer sewing machine family.

In contrast to Mott, whose discerning candor amounts almost to informational overkill, Peretz is close-mouthed about his charities. There have been reports, for example, that Peretz contributed as much as $500,000 to the McCarthy campaign, but Peretz admits to only $200,000 and the disclosure was made reluctantly.

Reports filed with the Secretary of State of New York indicate that Peretz and his wife made contributions totaling $95,000 on behalf of last year's unsuccessful Senate campaign of Democrat Paul O'Dwyer, another peace candidate. But Peretz says the figure is Massachusetts businessman Richard Russell together invested some $400,000 in the magazine, according to Ramparts sources. But Peretz cut off his support after the Six-Day War when Ramparts took what he considered a doctrinaire radical stand against Israel.

Peretz is a graduate of the Bronx High Schol of Sciences and Brandeis University, where he came under the influences of Max Lerner, Herbert Marcuse and Irving Howe—all from the leftward end of the spectrum.

Short, stocky, with a carefully trimmed red beard, Peretz is a radical who has watched his radicalism be outdistanced. In the early 1960s at Harvard, when picketing Woolworth's was considered a radical act, Peretz's activism and aggressive style quickly earned him a reputation as the university's enfant terrible.

Today he is in the disturbing position of being considered passe by the new radicals—whose nihilist philosophy he refuses to endorse.

THE TURNING POINT was prob-

Mott comes to philanthropy as to the manner born. He is the son of Charles Stewart Mott of Flint, Mich., the nonagenarian senior board member of General Motors, whose wealth is estimated at $800 million.

The elder Mott was 63 when Stewart was born to his fourth wife. The young man readily reveals the intimacy that the elder Mott, an archconservative, "didn't have the resiliency to cope with his late-life offspring.

"He had kids in order to please my mother, I think," says young Mott. By his own admission, the chronicle of Stewart's life is filled with evidences of rebellion against his father's style of life.

A $1500 Grand Tour

AT 17, HE DECIDED to "devote myself to public service." He dropped out of MIT's engineering program and took a year to hitchhike around the world (at a cost of $1500, according to Mott's exhaustive autobiographical data sheet).

Then Mott entered Columbia University, where he got two degrees and graduated with honors while living part of the time on a Chinese junk in the East River. He tried a variety of Tall (6 feet 2) burly (190 pounds) and good-looking (a female aide says he has been taken for both Warren Beatty and Robert Kennedy), Mott is highly intelligent, but no intellectual heavyweight.

His philanthropy, while consistently liberal, has no deep-seated philosophic base (he supported Rockefeller, switched to McCarthy and finally voted for Humphrey). It is for him a vocation, a form of expression and fulfillment. He is an active member of most of the major organizations to which he contributes, sitting on boards, planning conferences, raising money.

In New York—where he set up residence two years ago in an ostentatiously unplush $100,000 Park Avenue penthouse—he has created a veritable philanthropy factory, with a staff of five dispersing cash and volunteer time at an action-packed pace.

Mott's candor makes him almost too good to be true. His biographical data sheet is probably the most detailed document of its kind outside of an FBI security check, right down to the inclusion of his blood type (AB plus).

In the New York phone book, Mott lists himself as Stewart R. Mott, philanthropist.

With a minimun of prodding, he will recite a detailed financial report, announcing his annual income, his $5 million total worth, his roughly half-million annual chunk of philanthropy and a breakdown of tax deductions like an announcer reporting a golf match, has a favorite charity—Planned Parenthood, to which he has given $1.2 million over the last five years.

The ad drew $144,000 in responses, inspiring Mott to open an office for Rockefeller while the New York Governor went through his agonies of indecision.

But the Rockefeller camp was strangely inhospitable, and Mott

Reports filed with the Secretary of State of New York indicate that Peretz and his wife made contributions totaling $95,000 on behalf of last year's unsuccessful Senate campaign of Democrat Paul O'Dwyer, another peace candidate. But Peretz says the figure is not altogether accurate, since it includes some money they had collected from others. He does not volunteer the correct figure.

Peretz also backed the primary campaign of Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.) for mayor of New York City, and he has contributed to aid efforts for Biafran starvation victims. Over the years, Peretz has made substantial donations to a variety of liberal causes, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and Massachusetts Pax, a peace group he helped to form.

Where Mott took his money and decided on A Cause, Peretz's philanthropy has been more the consequence of his philosophic and ideological development. As such, it flows with the ripples and tides of that development. At various times, he has ceased to support causes as they (or he) moved into different ideological orbits.

Ramparts magazine (which, incidentally, now enjoys the support of Stewart Mott) is an example. Peretz and Ramparts took what he considered a doctrinaire radical stand against Israel.

Peretz is a graduate of the Bronx High Schol of Sciences and Brandeis University, where he came under the influences of Max Lerner, Herbert Marcuse and Irving Howe—all from the leftward end of the spectrum.

Short, stocky, with a carefully trimmed red beard, Peretz is a radical who has watched his radicalism be outdistanced. In the early 1960s at Harvard, when picketing Woolworth's was considered a radical act, Peretz's activism and aggressive style quickly earned him a reputation as the university's enfant terrible.

Today he is in the disturbing position of being considered passe by the new radicals—whose nihilist philosophy he refuses to endorse.

Floored by Blacks

THE TURNING POINT was probably 1967's New Politics Convention, of which Peretz was a major supporter and principal organizer. According to Jerome Grossman, a friend and chairman of Massachusetts Pax, Peretz somewhat naively hoped that the Chicago gathering would bring "at long last the coalization of civil rights, liberal and peace groups the people had been looking for for years."

But he had reckoned without the swiftly changing state of radical politics and, especially, the emergence of black separatism. The convention quickly deteriorated under pressures from a black caucus.

"We were not prepared to cope with it culturally, politically or socially," Grossman ruefully recalls. "We had come there with the idea of nominating Martin Luther King and Benjamin Spock for President and Vice President. But the element of black separatism floored us. We had never even heard of the idea of a black caucus."

The deterioration of the New Politics convention was a shattering blow. Michael Walzer, an assistant professor of government at Harvard and a Brandeis associate of Peretz, said, "The new left for awhile had a healthy growth, and Marty was involved in that growth. Then, things went sour—the racial split, the effects of the war in producing whole patterns of frustration and nihilism. And Marty was never that way. He avoided the pathologies and became one of the critics."

Undermined Credentials

NIHILISM IS NOT in the Peretz lexicon, try as he might to keep abreast of the movements of the young. "There's not going to be a revolution in this country," Peretz says. "The people who talk about revolution are irresponsible and make no sense. I for one will not make the choice between the confrontationists and vacillating, vapid liberals."

It is talk like this, his dogged loyalty to McCarthy despite the latter's recent "betrayals" in the Senate and his almost compulsive devotion to Israel that have undermined his credentials with the new, new left.

Simultaneously, his insistence on the dismantling of corporate power as the essential step in societal reform—with its echoes of 1930s Marxist theory—has put him in trouble with liberals.

Clearly, the stresses have had their effect. Peretz is more subdued, with an almost paranoid suspicion of the press (especially after he was roasted in the New York Times for his participation in an intellectuals' conference at Princeton). He intends to pull in his wings for a year and turn to what he insists is his first love—teaching. At Harvard, he remain extremely popular with most students, who he insists should call him by his first name.

"I've let myself in for being a public man and don't want to be," he said recently. "I was in the airport yesterday and I was recognized. It was terrifying."

An Eight-Year Tax Scheme

STEWART MOTT lists 15 enterprises as financial investments in his inclusive biographical data sheet. They include "The Believers," an off-Broadway musical; Club Tours, a travel agency; Red Diamond Marine, a tanker firm; Pop-Op Corp. (the Cheetah night clubs), and Ramparts magazine, to which he has loaned $50,000.

In addition, he refers to a variety of listed common stocks in publicly held corporations and a number of tax-exempt bonds. Among the latter are $3 million in municipal bonds, for which he pays no taxes on income.

Mott has an income of $1 million a year, 10 per cent of it from investments and the rest from a trust established by his father. He donates about $400,000 of his income annually and takes a 30 per cent tax deduction. He is working on a scheme that will, at the end of eight years of giving away at least 90 per cent of his taxable income each year, enable him to take unlimited deductions for charity.

Our 'Colonial' Policy in Mideast Is Archaic

able to conduct their strategic roles from within their own territories, they have chosen to focus their confrontation in the Middle East. In so doing, they are vulnerable to the violent forces of the Middle Eastern historical experience, including conflicting nationalisms, revolution and Pan-Arabism.

But we are confronted with a situation which can no longer be called direct, since France's traditional ties and its ability to employ a mediator's policy within the present context are recognized by both the U.S.S.R. and the Arab states. Though France's military capabilities are limited, her influence in the Middle East has increased.

The potential of France's cultural and psychological role in the region effectively challenges American and Soviet influence. Do we, or our rivals, have the ability to match this French influence and, if necessary from a strategic point of view, to neutralize it? This is a very difficult question for Americans since the United States does not have any significant bonds of history, tradition or culture in the region.

The United States and the Soviet Union have chosen to continue the competition using traditional, if not classical, methods of political gaming. In such a system, military assistance, the presence of military advisers and the like, including at times rather sophisticated weaponry, replace the traditional military base and, in so doing, create a political base which is equal to a center of military power in the traditional system.

In the Middle Eastern context, democracy represents an attempt to organize progress while communism attempts to disorganize tradition. Both ideologies operate in an environment where change is viewed as detrimental since it challenges tradition.

Communism has been appealing only when Soviet or Chinese seduction can be invoked to gain and consolidate one's position momentarily. Similarly, democracy has had little lasting effect in the Middle East except to the extent that it has moved a United States driven by military imperatives to bestow economic favors on those countries which demonstrate accommodating attitudes.

Tunisia and Morocco, for example, continue to receive American aid primarily because of their approval of the U.S. role in Vietnam and their moderate stand in the Arab-Israeli conflict. Algerian, Syrian and Iraqi radicalism and Tunisian and Moroccan moderation characterize the entire area.

U.S. policy in the Middle East is inherently limited by at least two basic considerations. Military intervention provides, at best, only a temporary and precarious base for the extension of national power. Nonmilitary policy options, including economic aid, technical assistance and diplomatic pressure, provide no certain guarantees of American success in influencing local politics.

Such inherent limitations are compounded by environmental limitations of endemic political instability. Over the next ten years, the United States can expect to encounter continually shifting regional power alignments as well as domestic competition between civilian and military, technocratic and ideological or charismatic elites. U.S. policy is likely to be shaped by a sense of limitation rather than of hope.

Encouraging Fluidity

RECOGNIZING these limitations on American foreign policy, what constitutes a positive American policy toward the Middle East? Politically, the United States should encourage the inherent fluidity of the region. It should, however, also attempt to structure the shifts of political alignments by inducing Turkey and Iran to assume a more active role in regional politics.

Third parties such as France, Yugoslavia and other European states should be encouraged to participate in the exercise of this policy. The involvement of such powers could offer the other states of the region alternative outlets for the external expression of sovereignty.

This political dimension of a positive American policy can be implemented only by considering the possibility that democracy can be counter to U.S. interests and communism counter to Soviet interests. This would allow us to support or oppose governments without regard for their domestic or foreign ideological commitments.

By de-emphasizing our identification with our client states, we would make them more inward-looking and viable. The Soviet clients would be deprived of their only source of legitimacy: the ogre of American imperialism. France and other third powers could assume more responsibility, and the United States would become more assertive.

In short, the United States should support governments with the purpose of fracturing the present transnational alignments.

The United States should admit the counterproductive effects of the Truman and Eisenhower Doctrines and CENTO, which have merely introduced cold war tensions and polarized the Middle East into pro- and anti-Western camps. It should realize that the cost of American bases in Saudi Arabia, Libya and Morocco has outweighed strategic American gains. Naval power can replace land bases, as the Soviets are demonstrating.

On Common Interests

THE SECOND dimension of a positive U.S. policy consists of Middle Eastern-American social and economic cooperation to affect revolution in the area. The United States should concentrate on what is satisfactory to it and not on what the Middle East might expect from it.

This concerted effort would be directed at those areas of interest that are common to the Middle Eastern states and the United States. Generally speaking, these may be limited to Arab-Israeli relations, settlement of border disputes among several states of the region and narrowing of the widening gap between human needs and resources.

This common effort should take a decidedly regional cast. Extraregional cooperation should proceed on an ad hoc basis and divergent interests and policies should be tolerated.

What would this fluid regional system mean for the Middle East? The polarized camps of reactionary, monarchist, anticommunist states and of revolutionary, populist, socialist states would dissolve into nonideological alignments. The security of all the states would be increased by the diminished possibility of hostile coalitions being formed against them; all would find increased safety in multiple centers of power competing with one another.

Middle Eastern-American cooperation does not describe objective realities as much as it indicates worthwhile possiblilities. It does not assume the existence of an indivisible Middle Eastern-American community of interests; rather, it points the way to realistic achievements which can be gained through coordination.

This effort should not be conceived as a means of perpetuating Washington's "leadership of the free world" but rather as a way to increase jointly the ability of the Middle East and America to deal effectively with identifiable common problems, including aggression from outside or inside the region. Admittedly, these concerns will be qualitatively different from those assumed by the United States in the Middle East since World War II. Washington must decide between realistic achievements and improbable possibilities.

underlie conflict did not occur to the generation of the 1930s. Theirs was a world in which economics seemed to be the one obstacle to the millennium.

Power did not appear in their vision —though this blindness in the decade of Hitler and Stalin is hard to imagine, let alone to understand. C. P. Snow's description in "The Masters" (1951) of the conflict for power within the "selfless" and "disinterested" small community of an Oxbridge college profoundly shocked the sensibilities of a generation that had grown up believing that conflicts were always motivated by economic self-interest and could be avoided by eliminating gain; that is, by nationalizing the economy.

One need not be in favor of free enterprise—let alone a friend of wealth —to see the fallacy in this argument. But reason had little to do with the belief in government ownership as the panacea. The argument was simply: "Private business and profits are bad —ergo government ownership must be good." We may still believe in the premise, but we no longer accept the "ergo."

Thus the Labor government felt committed in 1967 to renationalize the British steel industry (just at the time when, ironically, the industry was on the verge of long-term decline and when, therefore, takeover by government meant the highest possible windfall profit for the shareholders). But it immediately declared that the industry would have to be run for profit. It put in as chief executive the purest of archcapitalists, Lord Melchett, heir to one of the world's greatest industrial fortunes (his grandfather and father founded and built Imperial Chemical Industries), a hereditary peer and a top-flight investment banker in addition to being a lifelong Tory!

By contrast, less than 20 years earlier, when steel was first nationalized in Britain by an earlier Labor government, an ideologically "pure" trade union stalwart had been the chief executive-designate.

There is still a good deal of resistance to the responsibility of politics and resentment of the burden of political decision. Indeed, the young today want to "drop out" altogether—in a frightening revival of the hostility to responsibility that made an earlier young generation, 40 years ago, so receptive to totalitarian promises and slogans. But no one, least of all the young, believes any longer that the conflicts, the decisions, the problems would be eliminated by turning things over to government. Government, on the contrary, has itself become one of the wicked "vested interests" for the young.

Two 'Accomplishments'

THE GREATEST factor in the disenchantment with government is that government has not performed. The record over these last 30 or 40 years is a record of great promises and great achievements. We have kept our promises. We have achieved what we set out to achieve. We could certainly not have done worse if we had done nothing . . . Sao Paulo in Brazil . . . inundated by similar floods of rural, illiterate Negroes, did nothing—and is in better shape than New York City.

Government promised to provide social services. It promised to create a new and happy society. It promised to release creative energies. It promised to do away with ugliness and envy and strife.

No matter how well it is doing its jobs—and in some areas, in some countries, some jobs are being done very well—the welfare state turns out at best to be just another big insurance company, as exciting, as creative and as inspiring as insurance companies tend to be. This explains why President Johnson's spectacular performance in enacting the unfinished welfare tasks of the New Deal failed to make him a hero with the public.

The best we get from government in the welfare state is competent mediocrity. More often, we do not even get that; we get incompetence such as we would not tolerate in an insurance company. In every country, there are big areas of government administration where there is no performance whatever—only costs.

This is true not only of the mess of the big cities, which no government—United States, British, Japanese or Russian—has been able to handle. It is true in education. It is true in transportation. And the more we expand the welfare state, the less capable even of routine mediocrity does it seem to become.

A Paper Harvest

I DO NOT know whether Americans are particularly inept at public administration—though they are hardly particularly gifted for it. Perhaps we are only more sensitive than other people to the incompetence and arrogance of bureaucracy because we have had, until recently, comparatively so much less of it than other people.

In any case, we are now appalled to realize that, during the past three decades, Federal payments to the big cities have increased almost a hundredfold for all kinds of programs whereas results from this incredible dollar-flood are singularly unimpressive. What is impressive is the administrative incompetence.

We now have ten times as many government agencies concerned with city problems as we had in 1939. We have increased by a factor of 1000 or so the number of reports and papers that have to be filled out before anything can be done in the city. Social workers in New York City spend some 70 or 80 per cent of their time filling out papers for Washington, for the state government in Albany and for New York City. No more than 20 or 30 per cent of their time, that is, almost an hour and a half a day, is available for their clients, the poor.

As James Reston reported in the New York Times (Nov. 23, 1966), there were then 170 different Federal aid programs on the books, financed by over 400 separate appropriations and administered by 21 Federal departments and agencies aided by 156 Washington offices. Cooperation between various agencies is replacing concern with results and with responsibility.

Ends in Themselves

MODERN GOVERNMENT has become ungovernable. There is no government today that can still claim control of its bureaucracy and of its various agencies. Government agencies are all becoming autonomous, ends in themselves, and directed by their own desire for power, their own narrow vision rather than by national policy.

This is a threat to the basic capacity of government to give direction and leadership. Increasingly, policy is fragmented and execution is governed by the inertia of the large bureaucratic empires rather than by policy.

Bureaucrats keep on doing what their procedures describe. Their tendency, as is only human, is to identify what is in the best interest of the agency with what is right, and what fits administrative convenience with effectiveness. As a result, the welfare state cannot set priorities. It cannot concentrate its tremendous resources —and therefore does not get anything done.

The President of the United States may still be the most powerful ruler—more powerful than either the prime ministers of parliamentary regimes dependent upon a majority in parliament, or the dictators who can be overthrown by conspiracies against them among the powerful factions within their totalitarian apparatus. And yet even the President of the United States cannot direct national policy any more.

The various bureaucracies do much what they want to do. The Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, for instance, has been making its own policies and pursuing its own course these last 20 years, with little concern for what the incumbent President believes or orders. The Soil Conservation Service and the Bureau of Reclamation, the Forestry Service and the Weather Bureau, the Federal Trade Commission and the Army Engineers made in an orderly and systematic fashion. It is no longer possible for any decision to be arrived at by negotiation, consultation, agreement. It can only be arrived at by dictation or by exhaustion. Although force has, therefore, become infinitely more important in the international system, it has become infinitely less decisive—unless it be the ultimate force of a nuclear war that might destroy mankind.

Decisions are also no longer effective. No longer can they be expected to be carried out. In the international sphere, we have the same divorce of policy from execution that characterizes domestic government.

We get more and more governments. But all this does is to increase costs. For each of these sovereignties has to have its own foreign service, its own armed forces and so on. And no government, whether its territory spans the continents or is smaller than one city block, can any longer discharge the first duty of government: protection from, and defense against, attack from outside.

It is perfectly true that most of the new "ministates" are political absurdities, defenseless against the threat of instant annihilation. But so are the superpowers in this age of nuclear "overkill." With nuclear weapons being easy to make and, in effect, available to the smallest and weakest country, there is no "defense." There is only — questionably — "deterrence" — by

"We could certainly not have done worse if we had done nothing . . . Sao Paulo in Brazil . . . inundated by similar floods of rural, illiterate Negroes, did nothing—and is in better shape than New York City."

This is not happening, as the liberals had always hoped, because a political world community has transcended the narrow, petty boundaries of national states. On the contrary, the national state is everywhere in danger of collapsing into petty parochial baronies—whether French Canada or an independent Flanders, Biafra in West Africa or self-governing Scotland.

To our grandparents, around 1900, it was clear that the trend ran toward larger government units. It was clear to them that the national state created political organisms capable of effective cooperation in international society. This had been the lesson of 19th century history. Indeed, the century closed with the last "unification," though an imposed one: the taking over of the Boer republics of South Africa by the British and their incorporation into the British Empire.

Since then, the process has been one of steady fission. It began in the Balkan wars, which, undertaken to create larger unified countries, ended by creating more small ones. It has accelerated ever since. Even Czechoslovakia, the most successful of the new countries created in World War I, proved incapable of becoming the effective agent of unification but was torn apart by the strife of the national minorities—German, Hungarian and Slovak—that refused to be "unified."

Not one of the new countries established since World War II has so far created the unified nation that, to the 19th century, was so obviously the end point of history. Instead, we are getting tribal splinters pretending to be national states, imposing on their citizens all the costs of a national state, driven by all the jealousies, resentments and pride of a national state—but incapable of being an effective organ either of domestic government or of the international community. Increasingly, we are fragmenting the world into governmental pygmies, each endowed with tremendously expensive toys, but incapable of being effective. The "national state" no longer functions as the effective organ for political tasks.

productive. All of man's institutions—and for that matter, all men—are committed to what they are used to and reluctant to accept that it no longer needs doing or that it does not produce results. But government is under far greater pressure to cling to yesterday than any other institution. Indeed, the typical response of government to the failure of an activity is to double its budget and staff.

Nothing in history, for instance, can compare in futility with those prize activities of the American Government, its welfare policies and its farm policies. Both policies are largely responsible for the disease they are supposed to cure. We have known this for quite some time—in the case of the farm program since before World War II; in the case of the welfare program certainly since 1950.

The problem of the urban poor is undoubtedly vast. No city in history has ever been able to absorb an influx of such magnitude as the American cities have had to absorb since the end of World War II. Wherever it happened in the past, there was the same collapse of family, community and local government—in the cities of England in the late 18th century when the Irish came in; in the cities of North America around 1840, again with the coming of the Irish; in the cities of continental Europe later on, as for instance when the Czechs started to migrate in large numbers into the Vienna of the Hapsburgs in the closing years of the 19th century.

The influx of almost two million

ized in Britain by an earlier Labor government, an ideologically "pure" trade union stalwart had been the chief executive-designate.

There is still a good deal of resistance to the responsibility of politics and resentment of the burden of political decision. Indeed, the young today want to "drop out" altogether—in a frightening revival of the hostility to responsibility that made an earlier young generation, 40 years ago, so receptive to totalitarian promises and slogans. But no one, least of all the young, believes any longer that the conflicts, the decisions, the problems would be eliminated by turning things over to government. Government, on the contrary, has itself become one of the wicked "vested interests" for the young.

Two 'Accomplishments'

THE GREATEST factor in the disenchantment with government is that government has not performed. The record over these last 30 or 40 years has been dismal. Government has proven itself capable of doing only two things with great effectiveness. It can wage war. And it can inflate the currency. Other things it can promise, but only rarely accomplish.

Its record as an industrial manager, in the satellite countries of Eastern Europe as well as in the nationalized industries of Great Britain, has been unimpressive. Whether private enterprise would have done worse is not even relevant. For we expected near-perfection from government as industrial manager. Instead, we only rarely obtained even below-average mediocrity.

Government as a planner has hardly done much better (whether in Communist Czechoslovakia or in de Gaulle's capitalist France). But the greatest disappointment, the great letdown, is the fiasco of the welfare state.

Not many people would want to do without the social services and welfare benefits of an affluent, modern industrial society. But the welfare state promised to do far more than to profold for all kinds of programs whereas results from this incredible dollar-flood are singularly unimpressive. What is impressive is the administrative incompetence.

We now have ten times as many government agencies concerned with city problems as we had in 1939. We have increased by a factor of 1000 or so the number of reports and papers that have to be filled out before anything can be done in the city. Social workers in New York City spend some 70 or 80 per cent of their time filling out papers for Washington, for the state government in Albany and for New York City. No more than 20 or 30 per cent of their time, that is, almost an hour and a half a day, is available for their clients, the poor.

As James Reston reported in the New York Times (Nov. 23, 1966), there were then 170 different Federal aid programs on the books, financed by over 400 separate appropriations and administered by 21 Federal departments and agencies aided by 150 Washington bureaus and over 400 regional offices. One congressional session alone passed 20 health programs, 17 new educational programs, 15 new economic development programs, 12 new programs for the cities, 17 new resources development programs and four new manpower training programs, each with its own administrative machinery.

This is not perhaps a fair example—even of American administrative incompetence. That we speak of "urban crisis" when we face a problem of race explains a lot of our troubles. But in other areas, the welfare state has not performed much better. Nor is the administrative mess a peculiarly American phenomenon.

The daily press in Great Britain, in Germany, in Japan, in France, in Scandinavia—and increasingly in the Communist countries as well—reports the same confusion, the same lack of performance, the same proliferation of agencies, of programs, of forms—and the same triumph of accounting rules over results. Everywhere, rivalry behave similarly become "independent" rather than "autonomous."

Not so long ago, policy control by the political organs of government could be taken for granted. Of course, there were "strong" and "weak" Presidents as there were "strong" and "weak" prime ministers. A Franklin Roosevelt or a Winston Churchill could get things done that weaker men could not have accomplished. But this was, people generally believed, because they had the courage of strong convictions, the willingness to lay down bold and effective policies, the ability to mobilize public vision. Today, a "strong" President or a "strong" prime minister is not a man of strong policies; he is the man who knows how to make the lions of the bureaucracy do his bidding.

John Kennedy had all the strength of conviction and all the boldness of a "strong" President; this is why he captured the imagination, especially of the young. He had, however, no impact whatever on the bureaucracy. He was a "strong" President in the traditional sense. But he was a singularly ineffectual one. His contemporary, Nikita Khrushchev in Russia, similarly failed to be effective despite his apparent boldness and his popular appeal.

By contrast, bureaucratic men who have no policies and no leadership qualities emerge as effective—they somehow know how to make red tape do their bidding. But then, of course, they use it for the one thing red tape is good for, i.e., bundling up yesterday in neat packages.

This growing disparity between apparent power and actual lack of control is perhaps the greatest crisis of government. We are very good at creating administrative agencies. But no sooner are they called into being than they become ends in themselves, acquire their own constituency as well as a "vested right" to grants from the Treasury, continuing support by the taxpayer and immunity to political direction. No sooner, in other words, are they born than they defy public will and public policy.

Collapse Into Baronies

THE CRISIS of government domestically is nothing compared to the crisis of government as an effective organ in international life. In the international arena, government has all but disintegrated. The "sovereign fective organ either of domestic government or of the international community. Increasingly, we are fragmenting the world into governmental pygmies, each endowed with tremendous power vis-a-vis its citizens, each perfectly capable of tyranny but incapable of governing.

In 1900, there were fewer than 50 sovereignties in the whole world—20 in Europe and 20 in the Americas, with the rest of the world having fewer than a dozen. World War I increased the number to about 60. Now we have more than 160, with new "ministates" joining the ranks almost every month. Only on the American continents has there been no splintering of sovereignties.

There are 20-odd sovereignties of 1900 that are still, by and large, the political reality of today (except in the rapidly fragmenting Caribbean area). Some of the new sovereignties are very large countries: India, Pakistan, Indonesia. But most of them are smaller than the Central American countries an earlier generation contemptuously dismissed as "banana republics" and much too small to discharge the minimum responsibilities of sovereignty.

Today we have scores of "independent nations" whose population is well below a million people. Indeed, we have some whose population is hardly as large as that of a good-sized village.

Impotent Superpowers

AT THE OTHER end of the scale, we have the "superpowers," whose very size and power debar them from having a national policy. They are concerned with everything, engaged everywhere, affected by every single political event, no matter how remote or petty. But policy is choice and selection. If one cannot choose not to be engaged, one cannot have a policy—and neither the United States nor Russia can, in effect, say: "We are not interested."

The superpowers are the international version of the welfare state—and, like the welfare state, incapable of priorities or of accomplishments. The superpowers, therefore, invariably overreact—as Russia has done in the satellite countries and as the United States has done in the Congo, in Santo Domingo and perhaps in Vietnam. Yet they underachieve. Their might, although great enough to annihilate each other—and the rest of us into the bargain—is inappropriate to the political task.

This means that decisions in the international sphere can no longer be

Decisions are also no longer effective. No longer can they be expected to be carried out. In the international sphere, we have the same divorce of policy from execution that characterizes domestic government.

We get more and more governments. But all this does is to increase costs. For each of these sovereignties has to have its own foreign service, its own armed forces and so on. It is perfectly true that most of the new "ministates" are political absurdities, defenseless against the threat of instant annihilation. But so are the superpowers in this age of nuclear "overkill." With nuclear weapons being easy to make and, in effect, available to the smallest and weakest country, there is no "defense." There is only — questionably — "deterrence" by the threat of retaliation. But if government cannot defend its people, the first reason for the very existence of government has gone.

This may be regarded as gross exaggeration. It certainly is not the picture the older generation still sees. But it is, increasingly, the reality. It is the situation to which we react. And the young people, who are not, as we older ones are, influenced by the memories of our love affair with government, see the monstrosity of government, its disorganization, its lack of performance and its impotence rather than the illusions the older generation still cherishes and still teaches in the class room.

Immovable Objects

CERTAIN THINGS are inherently difficult for government. Being by design a protective institution, it is not good at innovation. It cannot really abandon anything. The moment government undertakes anything, it becomes entrenched and permanent. Better administration will not alter this. Its inability to innovate is grounded in government's legitimate and necessary function as society's protective and conserving organ.

A government activity, a government installation and government employment become immediately built into the political process itself. This holds true whether we talk of a declining industry—such as the nationalized British coal mines or the government-owned railroads of Europe and Japan. It holds equally true in Communist countries. No matter how bankrupt, for instance, the Stalinist economic policies have become in Czechoslovakia, Hungary or Poland, any attempt to change them immediately runs into concern for the least productive industries, which, of course, always have the most, the lowest-paid and the least-skilled—and, therefore, the most "deserving"—workers.

The inability of government to abandon anything is not limited to the economic sphere. We have known for well over a decade, for instance, that the military draft that served the United States well in a total war is immoral and demoralizing in a cold war or "limited war" period. No one defends our present system—yet we extend it year after year on a "temporary" basis.

The same inability to abandon applies to research projects supported by government. It holds true as soon as government supports the arts. Every beneficiary of a government program immediately becomes a "constituent." He immediately organizes himself for effective political action and for pressure on the decision-maker.

All institutions, of course, find it hard to abandon yesterday's tasks and to stop doing the un-

Both policies are largely responsible for the disease they are supposed to cure. We have known this for quite some time—in the case of the farm program since before World War II; in the case of the welfare program certainly since 1950.

The problem of the urban poor is undoubtedly vast. No city in history has ever been able to absorb an influx of such magnitude as the American cities have had to absorb since the end of World War II. Wherever it happened in the past, there was the same collapse of family, community and local government—in the cities of England in the late 18th century when the Irish came in; in the cities of North America around 1840, again with the coming of the Irish; in the cities of continental Europe later on, as for instance when the Czechs started to migrate in large numbers into the Vienna of the Hapsburgs in the closing years of the 19th century.

The influx of almost two million rural Negroes and Puerto Ricans into New York City alone in less than a 15-year period exceeded any of these earlier migrations. It is unprecedented in the history of cities. But we certainly could not have done worse if we had done nothing at all. In fact, the 19th century cities that did nothing, did better. And so, these last 20 years, has Sao Paulo in Brazil, which, inundated by similar floods of rural, illiterate Negroes fresh from serfdom, did nothing—and is in better shape than New York City.

Our welfare policies were not designed to meet this problem. They were perfectly rational—and quite effective—as measures for the temporary relief of competent people who were unemployed only because of the catastrophe of the Great Depression. Enacted in the mid-1930s, the relief policies had essentially finished their job by 1940. But being government programs, they could not be abandoned. Far too massive a bureaucracy had been built. The emotional investment in these programs and in their slogan had become far too great. They had become "symbols" of the New Deal.

Small wonder, then, that we reached for them when the entirely different problems of the 1950s arose, that is, when the rural Negro moved into the core city in large numbers. And small wonder that these programs did not work, that instead they aggravated the problem and increased the helplessness, the dependence, the despair of the Negro masses. But all we could do when relief failed to relieve was to double the budget and to double the number of people engaged in filling out forms.

An Opposite Result

THE FARM program tells the same story. It was designed—also in the 1930s—to save the family farmer and to restore his economic and social health. Instead it has subsidized his replacement by large, heavily capitalized and highly productive "industrial farms." This may well be a more desirable result than the one the farm program was meant—and is still meant—to produce. But it was an abysmal failure in terms of the program's announced objectives. Yet the program goes on, with an increased budget and increasingly perverse consequences.

Lest this be read as a criticism of the American Government, let me add that this experience knows no distinction of race, creed or nationality. The depressed-areas policy in Great Britain dates back to the 1920s. In all that time, it has not restored to economic health one single "depressed area." But it has effectively penalized the shift of labor to areas of higher productivity, higher wages and better jobs. It thereby has slowed growth in the healthy regions. Yet whenever it is realized that the "depressed areas" are still depressed, the budget goes up.

Government is a poor manager. It is, of necessity, concerned with procedure, just as it is also, of necessity, large and cumbersome. Government is properly conscious that it administers public funds and must account for every penny. It has no choice but to be "bureaucratic"—in the common usage of the term.

Every government is, by definition, a "government of paper forms." This means inevitably high cost. For "control" of the last 10 per cent of any phenomenon always costs more than the first 90 per cent. If control tries to account for everything, it becomes prohibitively expensive. Yet this is what government is always expected to do.

And the reason is not just "bureaucracy" and red tape; it is a much sounder one. A "little dishonesty" in government is a corrosive disease. It rapidly spreads to infect the whole body politic. Yet the temptation to dishonesty is always great. People of modest means and dependent on a salary handle very large public sums. People of modest position dispose of power and award contracts and privileges of tremendous importance to other people—construction jobs, radio channels, air routes, zoning laws, building codes and so on.

To fear corruption in government is not irrational. This means, however, that government "bureaucracy"—and its consequent high costs—cannot be eliminated. Any government that is not a "government of paper forms" degenerates rapidly into a mutual looting society.

Politics Looks Elsewhere

THE GENERATION that was in love with the state 30 and 40 years ago believed fondly that government would be economical. Eliminating the "profit motive" was thought to reduce costs. This was poor economics, to begin with. It is worse public administration.

The politician's attention does not go to the 90 per cent of money and effort that is devoted to existing programs and activities. They are left to their own devices and to the tender mercies of mediocrity. Politics—rightly—is primarily concerned with "new programs." It is focused on crisis and problems and issues. It is not focused on doing a job. Politics, whatever the form of government, is not congenial to managerial organization and makes government defective in managerial performance.

We have built elaborate safeguards to protect the administrative structure within government against the political process. This is the purpose of every civil service. But although this protects the going machinery from the distortions and pressures of politics, it also [illegible] the incumbents in the assumption: that each is short-lived and temporary.

We might, from the beginning, assume that it will come to an end within five or ten years unless specifically renewed. And we may discipline ourselves not to renew any program unless it has the results that it promised when first started. We may, let us hope, eventually build into government the capacity to appraise results and systematically to abandon yesterday's tasks.

Yet such measures will still not convert government into a "doer." They will not alter the main lesson of the last 50 years: government is not a "doer."

The purpose of government is to make fundamental decisions and to make them effectively. The purpose of government is to focus the political energies of society. It is to dramatize issues. It is to present fundamental choices. The purpose of government, in other words, is to govern. This, as we have learned in other institutions, is incompatible with "doing." Any attempt to combine government with "doing" on a large scale paralyzes the decision-making capacity.

There is reason today why soldiers, civil servants and hospital administrators look to business management for concepts, principles and practices. For business, during the last 30 years, has had to face, on a much smaller scale, the problem that government now faces: the incompatibility between "governing" and "doing." Business management learned that the two have to be separated, and that the top organ, the decision-maker, has to be detached from "doing." Otherwise he does not make decisions, and the "doing" does not get done, either.

In business, this goes by the name of "decentralization." The term is misleading. It implies a weakening of the central organ, the top management of a business. The true purpose of decentralization, however, is to make the center, the top management of business, strong and capable of performing the central, the top-management, task. The purpose is to make it possible for top management to concentrate on decision-making and direction, to slough off the "doing" to operating managements, each with its own mission and goals and with its own sphere of action and autonomy.

If this lesson were applied to government, the other institutions of society would then rightly become the "doers." "Decentralization" applied to government would not be just another form of "federalism" in which local rather than central government discharges the "doing" tasks. It would rather be a systematic policy of using the other, the nongovernmental, institutions of the society—the hospital as well as the university, business as well as labor unions—for the actual "doing," i.e., for performance, opera-

"Government would be seen as society's resource for the determination of major objectives and as the 'conductor' of social diversity . . . The conductor himself does not play an instrument. . . . His job is to know the capacity of each instrument and to evoke optimal performance from each."

The nongovernmental institutions—university, business and hospital, for instance—would be seen as organs for the accomplishment of results. Government would be seen as society's resource for the determination of major objectives and as the "conductor" of social diversity.

I have deliberately used the term "conductor." It might not be too fanciful to compare the situation today with the development of music 200 years ago. The dominant musical figure of the early 18th century was the great organ virtuoso, especially in the Protestant north. In organ music, as a Buxtehude or a Bach practiced it, one instrument with one performer expressed the total range of music. But as a result, it required almost superhuman virtuosity to be a musician.

By the end of the century, the organ virtuoso had disappeared. In his place was the modern orchestra. There, each instrument played only one part, and a conductor up front pulled together all these diverse and divergent instruments into one score and one performance. As a result, what had seem to be absolute limits to music suddenly disappeared. Even the small orchestra of Haydn could express a musical range for beyond the reach of the greatest organ virtuoso of a generation earlier.

hand, the German university has traditionally been almost as autonomous as the American "private" university, even though—as is the case with European universities generally—it is a state institution.

Reprivatization, therefore, may create social structures that are strikingly similar, though the laws in respect to ownership differ greatly from one country to another and from one institution to another. What they would have in common is a principle of performance rather than a principle of authority. In all of them, the autonomous institution created for the performance of a major social task would be the "doer."

Government would become increasingly the decison-maker, the vision-maker. It would try to figure out how to structure a given political objective so as to make it attractive to one of the autonomous institutions. It would, in other words, be the "conductor" that tries to think through what each instrument is best designed to do.

And just as we praise a composer for his ability to write "playable" music which best uses the specific performance characteristic of French horn, violin or flute, we may come to praise the lawmaker who best structures a particular task so as to make it most congenial for this one or that

What is more, of all our institutions, business is the only one that society will permit to disappear. It takes a major catastrophe, a war or a great revolution to allow the disappearance of a university or of a hospital, no matter how superfluous and unproductive they might have become. Again and again, for instance, the Catholic Church in the United States attempts to close down hospitals that have ceased to be useful. In almost every case, a storm of community nostalgia forces the supposedly absolute bishop to retract his decision.

But when the best-known airplane manufacturer in the United States, the Douglas Co., designer and producer of the DC-3, was in difficulty in 1967, neither the American public nor American Government rushed to its rescue. If a competitor had not bought the company and merged it into his operations, we would have accepted the disappearance of Douglas—with regret, to be sure, and with a good deal of nostalgic rhetoric, but also with the feeling: "It's their own fault, after all."

Precisely because business can make a profit, it must run the risk of loss. This risk, in turn, goes back to the second strength of business: Alone among all institutions, it has a test of case, it is likely to work even better in less desperate ones.

One instance of reprivatization in the international sphere is the World Bank. Though founded by governments, it is autonomous. If finances itself directly through selling its own securities on the capital market The International Monetary Fund, too, is a case of reprivatization. Indeed, if we develop the money and credit system we need for the world economy, we will have effectively reprivatized the creation and management of money and credit that for millennia have been considered the prime attributes of sovereignty.

Again, business is well equipped to become the "doer" in the international sphere. The multinational corporation, for instance, is our best organ for rapid social and economic development. In the Communications Satellite Corp. (COMSAT), we are organizing worldwide communications (another traditional prerogative of the sovereign) as a multinational corporation.

A socialist government, the Labor government of Britain, has used reprivatization to bring cheap energy to Britain—in contracts with the multinational oil companies for the exploration and development of the natural gas fields under the North Atlantic Ocean. And the multinational corporation may be the only institution equipped to get performance where the fragmentation into tribal splinter units, such as in the "ministates" of Equatorial Africa, makes performance by government impossible.

But domestically as well as internationally, business is, of course, only one institution and equipped to do only one task, the economic one. Indeed it is important to confine business—and every other institution—to its own task. Reprivatization will, therefore, entail using other nongovernmental institutions—the hospital, for instance, or the university—for other, noneconomic "doing" tasks. Indeed, the design of new nongovernmental, autonomous institutions as agents of social performance under reprivatization may well become a central job for tomorrow's political architects.

We do not face a "withering away of the state." On the contrary, we need a vigorous, a strong and a very active government. But we do face a choice between big but impotent government and a government that is strong because it confines itself to decision and direction and leaves the "doing" to others. We do not face a "return of laissez-faire" in which the economy is left alone. The economic sphere cannot and will not be considered to lie outside the public domain.

But the choices of economy—as well as for all other sectors—are no longer either complete governmental indifference or complete governmental control. In all major areas, we have a new choice: an organic diversity in which institutions are used to do what they are best equipped to do.

motive" was thought to reduce costs. This was poor economics, to begin with. It is worse public administration.

The politician's attention does not go to the 90 per cent of money and effort that is devoted to existing programs and activities. They are left to their own devices and to the tender mercies of mediocrity. Politics—rightly—is primarily concerned with "new programs." It is focused on crisis and problems and issues. It is not focused on doing a job. Politics, whatever the form of government, is not congenial to managerial organization and makes government defective in managerial performance.

We have built elaborate safeguards to protect the administrative structure within government against the political process. This is the purpose of every civil service. But although this protects the going machinery from the distortions and pressures of politics, it also protects the incumbents in the agencies from the demands of performance.

Of course, we maintain officially that civil service tenure is compatible with excellence. But if we had to choose, we would probably say that mediocrity in the civil service is a lesser evil than "politics." As far as the judiciary is concerned—where we first created "independence"—this is certainly true. How far it is true in administrative agencies is debatable. A good many people have come to believe that we need some way of rewarding performance and of penalizing nonperformance, even within civil service.

Still, the premium within government will be on not "rocking the boat" in existing agencies, that is, on no innovation, no initiative, but rather on doing with proper procedures what has been done before. Within the political process, attention will certainly not be paid to the on-going routine work unless there is the publicized malfunction of a "scandal."

As a result, management of the daily work of government will remain neglected, or be considered a matter of following "procedure" and of filling out forms. By excelling as a manager, no one in politics will get to the top unless at the same time he builds his own political machine, his own political following, his own faction.

We can—and must—greatly improve the efficiency of government. There is little reason these days to insist on "100 per cent audit," for instance. Modern sampling methods based on probability mathematics actually give us better control by inspecting a small percentage of the events. But we need something much more urgently: the clear definition of the results a policy is expected to produce, and the ruthless examination of results against these expectations.

This, in turn, demands that we spell out in considerable detail what results are expected rather than content ourselves with promises and manifestos. In the last century, the auditor general became a central organ of every government. We learned that we needed an independent agency to control the daily process of government and to make sure that money appropriated was spent for what it was intended for, and spent honestly. Now we may have to develop an independent government agency that compares the results of policies against expectations and that, independent of pressures from the executive as well as from the legislature, reports to the public any program that does not deliver.

Automatic Cutoff

WE MAY EVEN go further—though only a gross optimist would expect this today. We may build into government an automatic abandonment process. Instead of starting with the assumption that any program, any agency and any activity is likely to be eternal, we might start out with the opposite tralization, however, is to make the center, the top management of business, strong and capable of performing the central, the top-management, task. The purpose is to make it possible for top management to concentrate on decision-making and direction, to slough off the "doing" to operating managements, each with its own mission and goals and with its own sphere of action and autonomy.

If this lesson were applied to government, the other institutions of society would then rightly become the "doers." "Decentralization" applied to government would not be just another form of "federalism" in which local rather than central government discharges the "doing" tasks. It would rather be a systematic policy of using the other, the nongovernmental, institutions of the society—the hospital as well as the university, business as well as labor unions—for the actual "doing," i.e., for performance, operations, execution.

'Reprivatization'

SUCH A POLICY might more properly be called "reprivatization." The tasks that flowed to government in the last century because the family could not discharge them would be turned over to the new nongovernmental institutions that have sprung up and grown the last 60 to 70 years.

Government would start out by asking the question: "How do these institutions work and what can they do?" It would then ask: "How can political and social objectives be formulated and organized in such a manner as to become opportunities for performance for these institutions?" It would also ask: "And what opportunities for accomplishment of political objectives do the abilities and capacities of these institutions offer to government?"

This would be a very different role for government from that it plays in traditional political theory. In all our theories, government is the institution. If "reprivatization" were to be applied, however, government would become one institution — albeit the central, the top, institution.

Reprivatization would give us a different society from any our social theories now assume. In these theories, government does not exist. It is outside of society. Under reprivatization, government would become the central social institution.

Political theory and social theory, for the last 250 years, have been separate. If we applied to government and to society what we have learned about organization these last 50 years, the two would again come together.

I have deliberately used the term "conductor." It might not be too fanciful to compare the situation today with the development of music 200 years ago. The dominant musical figure of the early 18th century was the great organ virtuoso, especially in the Protestant north. In organ music, as a Buxtehude or a Bach practiced it, one instrument with one performer expressed the total range of music. But as a result, it required almost superhuman virtuosity to be a musician.

By the end of the century, the organ virtuoso had disappeared. In his place was the modern orchestra. There, each instrument played only one part, and a conductor up front pulled together all these diverse and divergent instruments into one score and one performance. As a result, what had seem to be absolute limits to music suddenly disappeared. Even the small orchestra of Haydn could express a musical range for beyond the reach of the greatest organ virtuoso of a generation earlier.

The conductor himself does not play an instrument. He need not even know how to play an instrument. His job is to know the capacity of each instrument and to evoke optimal performance from each. Instead of "performing," he "conducts." Instead of "doing," he leads.

Autonomy Important

THE NEXT major development in politics, and the one needed to make this middle-aged failure—our tired, overextended, flabby and impotent government — effective again, might therefore be the reprivatization of the "doing," of the performance of society's tasks. This need not mean "return to private ownership." Indeed, what is going on in the Communist satellite countries of Eastern Europe today—especially in Yugoslavia—is reprivatization in which ownership is not involved at all.

Instead, autonomous businesses depend on the market for the sale of goods, the supply of labor and even the supply of capital. That their "ownership" is in the hands of the government is a legal rather than an economic fact—though, of course, an important one. Yet to some Yugoslavs, it does not even appear to be incompatible with that ultra-bourgeois institution, a stock exchange.

What matters, in other words, is that institutions not be run by government but be autonomous. Cooperatives, for instance, are not considered "capitalist" in the Anglo-American countries, although they are "private" in that they are not run by government. And the same applies to "private" hospitals and the "private" universities. On the other ownership differ greatly from one country to another and from one institution to another. What they would have in common is a principle of performance rather than a principle of authority. In all of them, the autonomous institution created for the performance of a major social task would be the "doer."

Government would become increasingly the decison-maker, the vision-maker. It would try to figure out how to structure a given political objective so as to make it attractive to one of the autonomous institutions. It would, in other words, be the "conductor" that tries to think through what each instrument is best designed to do.

And just as we praise a composer for his ability to write "playable" music which best uses the specific performance characteristic of French horn, violin or flute, we may come to praise the lawmaker who best structures a particular task so as to make it most congenial for this one or that of the autonomous, self-governing, private institutions of a pluralist society.

Business is likely to be only one—but a very important—institution in such a structure. Whether it be owned by the capitalist, that is, by the investor, or by a cooperative or a government might even become a secondary consideration. For even if owned by government, it would have to be independent of government and autonomous—as the Yugoslavs show—not only in its day-to-day management but, perhaps more important, in its position in the market, and especially in a competitive capital market.

Created to Create

WHAT MAKES business particularly appropriate for reprivatization is that it is predominantly an organ of innovation; of all social institutions, it is the only one created for the express purpose of making and managing change. All other institutions were originally created to prevent, or at least to slow down, change. They become innovators only by necessity and most reluctantly.

Specifically, business has two advantages where government has major weaknesses. Business can abandon an activity. Indeed, it is forced to do so if it operates in a market—and, even more, if it depends on a market for its supply of capital. There is a limit beyond which even the most stubborn businessmen cannot argue with the market test, no matter how rich he may be himself. Even Henry Ford had to abandon the Model T when it ro longer could be sold. Even his grandson had to abandon the Edsel.

Unlike government, "business can abandon an activity. Indeed, it is forced to do so if it operates in a market . . . " Even Henry Ford II had to abandon the Edsel when it could no longer be sold.

Church in the United States attempts to close down hospitals that have ceased to be useful. In almost every case, a storm of community nostalgia forces the supposedly absolute bishop to retract his decision.

But when the best-known airplane manufacturer in the United States, the Douglas Co., designer and producer of the DC-3, was in difficulty in 1967, neither the American public nor American Government rushed to its rescue. If a competitor had not bought the company and merged it into his operations, we would have accepted the disappearance of Douglas—with regret, to be sure, and with a good deal of nostalgic rhetoric, but also with the feeling: "It's their own fault, after all."

Precisely because business can make a profit, it must run the risk of loss. This risk, in turn, goes back to the second strength of business: Alone among all institutions, it has a test of performance. No matter how inadequate profitability may be as an indicator, in certain respects, it is a test for all to see.

One can argue that this or that obsolete hospital is really needed in the community or that it will one day again be needed. One can argue that even the poorest university is better than none. The alumni or the community always have a "moral duty" to save "dear old Siwash." The consumer, however, is unsentimental. It leaves him singularly unmoved to be told that he has a duty to buy the products of a company because it has been around a long time.

The consumer always asks: "And what will the product do for me tomorrow?" If his answer is "nothing," he will see its manufacturer disappear without the slightest regret. And so does the investor.

This is the strength of business as an institution. It is the best reason for keeping it in private ownership. The argument that the capitalist should not be allowed to make profits is a popular one. But the real role of the capitalist is to be expendable. His role is to take risks and to take losses as a result. This role the private investor is much better equipped to discharge than the public one.

We want privately owned business precisely because we want institutions that can go bankrupt and can disappear. We want at least one institution that, from the beginning, is adapted to change, one institution that has to prove its right to survival again and again.

If we want a really strong and effective government, therefore, we should want businesses that are not owned by government. We should want businesses in which private investors, motivated by their own self-interest and deciding on the basis of their own best judgment, take the risk of failure.

The strongest argument for "private enterprise" is not the function of profit. The strongest argument is the function of loss. Because of it, business is the most adaptable, and the most flexible, of the institutions around. Therefore, it is the one best equipped to manage.

Some Global Successes

REPRIVATIZATION is still heretical doctrine, but it is no longer heretical practice. Reprivatization is hardly a creed of "fat cat millionaires" when Black Power advocates seriously propose making education in the slums "competitive" by turning it over to private enterprise, competing for the tax dollar on the basis of proven performance in teaching ghetto children.

It may be argued that the problems of the Black Ghetto in the American city are very peculiar problems—and so they are. They are extreme malfunctions of modern government. But if reprivatization works in the extreme noneconomic "doing" tasks. Indeed, the design of new nongovernmental, autonomous institutions as agents of social performance under reprivatization may well become a central job for tomorrow's political architects.

We do not face a "withering away of the state." On the contrary, we need a vigorous, a strong and a very active government. But we do face a choice between big but impotent government and a government that is strong because it confines itself to decision and direction and leaves the "doing" to others. We do not face a "return of laissez-faire" in which the economy is left alone. The economic sphere cannot and will not be considered to lie outside the public domain.

But the choices of economy—as well as for all other sectors—are no longer either complete governmental indifference or complete governmental control. In all major areas, we have a new choice: an organic diversity in which institutions are used to do what they are best equipped to do.

In this society, all sectors are "affected with the public interest," whereas in each sector a specific institution, under its own management and dedicated to its own job, emerges as the organ of action and performance.

50 Years Astray

THIS IS A DIFFICULT and complex structure. Such symbiosis between institutions can work only if each disciplines itself to strict concentration on its own sphere and to strict respect for the integrity of the other institutions. Each, to use again the analogy of the orchestra, must be content to play its own part.

This will come hardest to government, especially after the last 50 years in which it had been encouraged in the belief of the 18th-century organ virtuosos that it could—and should—play all parts simultaneously. But every institution will have to learn the same lesson.

Reprivatization will not weaken government. Indeed, its main purpose is to restore strength to sick government. We cannot go much further along the road on which government has been traveling these last 50 years. All we can get this way is more bureaucracy but not more performance. We can impose higher taxes, but we cannot get dedication, support and faith on the part of the public.

Government can gain greater girth and more weight, but it cannot gain strength or intelligence. All that can happen, if we keep on going the way we have been going, is a worsening sickness of government and growing disenchantment with it. And this is the prescription for tyranny, that is, for a government organized against its own society.

This can happen. It has happened often enough in history. But in a society of pluralist institutions, it is not likely to be effective too long. The Communists tried it, and after 50 years have shown—though they have not yet fully learned—that the structure of modern society and its tasks are incompatible with monolithic government. Monolithic government requires absolute dictatorship, which no one has ever been able to prolong much beyond the lifetime of any one dictator.

Ultimately, we will need new political theory and probably very new constitutional law. We will need new concepts and new social theory. Whether we will get these and what they will look like, we cannot know today.

But we can know that we are disenchanted with government—primarily because it does not perform. We can say that we need, in a pluralistic society, a government that can and does govern. This is not a government that "does"; it is not a government that "administers"; it is a government that governs.

Don't Give Up The Inquiry

There is something genuinely fine about the United States Navy's strict reliance on tradition—on freedom of the seas, unchallenged for a century and a half, on a hallowed legacy from a gallant, mortally wounded ship's captain who commanded his men, as he was carried below: Don't give up the ship. For the good of a military service, tradition cannot be taken lightly. Honor, duty, pride, discipline—all must be served and the military concept of justice cannot be expected to be the same as civil justice, because it serves a quite different demand. So the question before the Naval Court of Inquiry in Coronado, California, does come down, in a narrow sense, to whether Commander Bucher broke existing regulations. If the evidence indicates he did, by surrendering the Pueblo while he still had the power to resist, the Navy is obligated to deal with him in its own way by ordering him to stand trial.

But the chances are slim that the matter will end there, for there are review procedures that will ultimately take the verdict out of the hands of the admirals. And that, too, is as it should be, for tradition, however hallowed, is a tricky thing to rely upon. It is recorded with pride, for example, that the ship that was ordered not to surrender, in 1813, was the Frigate Chesapeake; less is said of the fact that this same vessel was involved in a naval encounter a few years earlier in which it actually did surrender after firing just one, solitary shot. Ordered to heave to by a British warship on suspicion that there were British deserters among its crew, the Chesapeake was on this occasion simply incapable of fighting. As set down in John Bach McMaster's History of the People of the United States:

> "The condition of the Chesapeake was a disgrace to the government that sent her out and to the officer who commanded her. Some of the guns were not even on the carriages. The sponges, the wads, the very cartridges would not go into the mouths of the few guns that were mounted. Not a rammer could be found. Not a powder-horn was full. The matches were all mislaid. The loggerheads were cold. After 20 minutes a gun was loaded and fired with a live coal brought from the cook's galley. Then, when twenty-one round shot had struck the hold . . . when three men had been killed and 18 wounded, (Commander) Barron hauled down his colors and the Chesapeake was a prize."

What this episode suggests is not that the Commander of the Chesapeake was blameless, but that the blame was as much on the "government that sent her out" and here, perhaps, we have the beginnings of a piece of naval tradition that might usefully be applied to the Pueblo affair. For with every new scrap of evidence, it becomes more and more apparent that the Pueblo was not much better prepared for its mission, or the risks it might reasonably be expected to encounter than was the Chesapeake when it surrendered 162 years ago.

It is said, by all hands, that nobody could have foreseen the risk of an unlawful seizure of the Pueblo in the open seas, but an article by Richard Halloran, appearing elsewhere on this page, offers some rather compelling evidence arguing otherwise. There was first of all the increasingly menacing mood of the North Koreans, and second the tragic mishap of the U.S.S. Liberty at the hands of a nation that could have logically been counted on for a lot more prudence than a country with which we are, for all practical purposes, in a state of hostilities.

So it is, first of all, fair to ask why elementary precautions were not taken, and after that the questions run on and on. When is the power to resist exhausted? When a third of the crew has been killed, or half, or the ship is on the bottom with all hands lost? What would resistance have accomplished, if the Pueblo had been sunk? What reprisals would the American public have then demanded, and where would this have ended, and with how big a second Asian war? Was the Pueblo a warship or simply a spy ship, with no particular relevance to a tradition which could not take into account the provocation offered from outside territorial waters by electronic espionage?

Perhaps there are no clear-cut answers to these questions. But they ought to be asked, before the inquiry is closed or another spy ship sent out. And because it is perfectly clear that the Pueblo mission was a calculated risk in which a large number of Naval officers and civilian policy-makers shared, all the risk-takers ought to be heard. In short, the same high standards imposed upon Commander Bucher by the Navy at the time of his capture should be imposed in turn upon the Navy and the United States Government that put him off a hostile coast, in a mockery of a warship, with no help on call, and nothing more to fall back on in the way of a contingency plan than a regulation based on a great moment in the history of an American fighting ship whose fighting record was at the best ambiguous.

Secretary Finch's Decision

There are several ways of looking at Secretary Robert Finch's action in terminating aid to five Southern school districts on Wednesday, and—in splendid, contradictory array—most of them have been given public expression in the past couple of days. Thus, the cutoff of Federal funds, which was accompanied by a pledge to restore them once the erring districts had complied with HEW desegregation guidelines, has been hailed as a victory and deplored as a sellout by spokesmen for the same istration has itself to blame for the way in which everyone has jumped to conclusions. During the campaign, Mr. Nixon chose to make this very delicate matter into a major campaign issue, and it was apparent at the time that he—along with just about everyone else—had failed to grasp its intricacies. Thus, while quickly correcting an impression that he meant not to invoke the penalties the Civil Rights Act provides for school districts which defy the law, Mr. Nixon did continue

The Manner of Protest

As one strongly opposed to the war in Vietnam and horrified by the detachment of "pragmatists" who smile patronizingly at the expression of any sense of urgency in a desire for peace, I am convinced that it is both proper and duty-fulfilling to carry protest to the leadership whenever the opportunity presents itself. But I was aghast and ashamed at the manner in which this protest was carried out during Richard Nixon's inaugural ceremonies. It is more than clear that those responsible could not see beyond their acne or they would have seized immediately on the appropriateness of that fashionable word "counterproductive" to describe their hysteria. Perhaps, too, with any sensitivity, they might have perceived the irony in their own shouts, "The whole world is watching."

It has been sad to watch the baton of the antiwar movement pass from the reasoned argument of academé to the contumacy of the Yippie. This misaction of these misguided children serves only to exacerbate a domestic ill while doing nothing to ameliorate the plague of war.

Fairfax County Board its final report and recommendation. It was disturbing to learn that certain members of this committee seem more concerned about promoting the popular use of firearms than about curbing their misuse. It has been suggested that the Fairfax County School Board provide firearm instruction in public schools just as it has drivers' education. Will guns become the next status symbol among today's teenagers?

During the first nine months of 1968 Fairfax County recorded the following firearm incidents: 6 gun murders; 59 robberies by gun; 50 felonious assaults by gun; 12 suicides by gun. When the issue is brought up again in February it is hoped that the Board of Supervisors will recognize the need for stricter gun control in Fairfax County and act accordingly.

Grape Workers' Demands

Matt Triggs, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in his letter which you published on Jan. 7, said that the issue in the national grape boycott is a union contract demand "which would require all workers to join the union whether they wanted to or not."

The truth is that the only demand facing the growers is that they recognize the union for purposes of bargaining.

Why the Surprise At Pueblo Seizure?

By Richard Halloran
Washington Post Staff Writer

THE QUESTION nobody seems to have asked yet in the Pueblo inquiry is: What made everyone so sure the North Koreans would not try something so audacious as capturing that ship?

Cmdr. Lloyd Bucher, captain of the ship, testified in answer to a question from the board of inquiry: "No, sir, I never considered I would ever be attacked on this mission. It never occurred to me . . . it never occurred to me that I would ever be put in the position I found myself in that afternoon."

Capt. Thomas Dwyer, in charge of naval intelligence in Japan at the time of the Pueblo's capture, testified in closed session that he did not even know the North Koreans had publicly warned the United States against such missions.

Rear Adm. Frank L. Johnson, the Navy commander in Japan at that time, testified that such a seizure was considered "highly improbable." He defined this as, "in effect, there is almost no chance of this happening."

"The feasibility of this type of operation," Johnson said of the Pueblo's mission, "is dependent to a large degree on the safety provided by the time-honored recognition of the freedom of the seas. This has gone on for over 150 years. No public vessel had been seized in all that time. This was a very excellent precedent on which to base the safety of any one individual ship."

Yet in June, 1967, only seven months earlier, Israeli aircraft and patrol boats strafed and torpedoed the USS Liberty, a ship similar to the Pueblo on a similiar mission on the high seas in the Mediterranean.

That was the case of a friendly nation attacking an American ship and by accident. Did it not occur to anyone that a hostile nation might do so and deliberately?

There was no attempt to capture the Liberty but the distinction between an attack and a seizure is surely only one of minor degree. In military terms, capture is the logical objective of attack.

CONSIDER THE evidence of North Korean hostility toward the United States in the following facts, all obtained from overt, public sources:

On Nov. 2, 1966, the day President Johnson left Seoul after a state visit, the North Koreans ambushed and killed six American and one South Korean soldier in the southern portion of the demilitarized zone that divides Korea.

That was the first incident in a marked upsurge of flagrant violations of the Korean armistice and clearly aggressive actions by the North Koreans.

During 1967, the North Koreans killed 131 American and South Korean soldiers and wounded 294 more in attacks along and below the DMZ. There were a total of 445 firefights along the DMZ, plus more in the South Korean interior.

Moreover, two American camps were shot up. There were artillery exchanges and at least one small tank battle. Two railroad trains were sabotaged.

At sea, numerous South Korean fishing vessels were captured. A South Korean patrol boat was blown out of the water by North Korean ships similiar to those that attacked the Pueblo. There were other exchanges of fire inside and outside territorial waters, north and south of an imaginary extension of the DMZ.

In December, 1967, North Korean Premier Kim Il-sung reiterated in the clearest terms the North Korean intention to reunify all of Korea under Communist domination by force of arms. It was the third time that he made [illegible] grace to the government that sent her out and to the officer who commanded her. Some of the guns were not even on the carriages. The sponges, the wads, the very cartridges would not go into the mouths of the few guns that were mounted. Not a rammer could be found. Not a powder-horn was full. The matches were all mislaid. The loggerheads were cold. After 20 minutes a gun was loaded and fired with a live coal brought from the cook's galley. Then, when twenty-one round shot had struck the hold . . . when three men had been killed and 18 wounded, (Commander) Barron hauled down his colors and the Chesapeake was a prize."

What this episode suggests is not that the Commander of the Chesapeake was blameless, but that the blame was as much on the "government that inquiry is closed or another spy ship sent out. And because it is perfectly clear that the Pueblo mission was a calculated risk in which a large number of Naval officers and civilian policy-makers shared, all the risk-takers ought to be heard. In short, the same high standards imposed upon Commander Bucher by the Navy at the time of his capture should be imposed in turn upon the Navy and the United States Government that put him off a hostile coast, in a mockery of a warship, with no help on call, and nothing more to fall back on in the way of a contingency plan than a regulation based on a great moment in the history of an American fighting ship whose fighting record was at the best ambiguous.

Secretary Finch's Decision

There are several ways of looking at Secretary Robert Finch's action in terminating aid to five Southern school districts on Wednesday, and—in splendid, contradictory array—most of them have been given public expression in the past couple of days. Thus, the cutoff of Federal funds, which was accompanied by a pledge to restore them once the erring districts had complied with HEW desegregation guidelines, has been hailed as a victory and deplored as a sellout by spokesmen for the same side. This is hardly surprising: it is difficult to think of a subject more intricately tangled in politics, passions, and head-breaking legal detail than this one—a combination that bodes ill for much in the way of public understanding.

Still, a few facts can be stated simply in relation to the Secretary's ruling and, in view of the storm that has broken over his head, they seem worth stressing. Secretary Finch, despite some pressure on him to the contrary, did not rescind the Department's cutoff order or grant the segregated districts in question either a delay or a reprieve. He put the orders into immediate effect and, citing his previous lack of responsibility for their development, said only that he was sending in teams to review the cases and to assist the districts in working out desegregation plans which must meet HEW standards within 60 days, if the districts want their money restored. The manner in which these subsequent operations are carried out, along with the Secretary's approach to several similar cases which are currently ripening for decision, will tell us a lot more about his thinking than Wednesday's action did. At this point, it therefore hardly seems fair for Mr. Finch's critics in the North to air the inferences they have drawn concerning his possible future behavior as if they were airing charges based on certainty or fact. The principal fact involved at this time is that Secretary Finch, who had any number of potential excuses at his disposal for delaying his predecessor's cutoff orders, instead upheld them.

To a considerable extent, of course, the Administration has itself to blame for the way in which everyone has jumped to conclusions. During the campaign, Mr. Nixon chose to make this very delicate matter into a major campaign issue, and it was apparent at the time that he—along with just about everyone else—had failed to grasp its intricacies. Thus, while quickly correcting an impression that he meant not to invoke the penalties the Civil Rights Act provides for school districts which defy the law, Mr. Nixon did continue to suggest that the enforcers of the law at HEW had been acting with too much zeal and too little sensitivity. Finally, he (as well as Mr. Finch) came to lay emphasis on the following proposition—that a Nixon Administration would of course invoke the penalties of the law against noncomplying districts, but that they would only do so as a last resort and after prior persuasion and negotiation had failed.

Since this was precisely what the Department had been claiming it was doing all along in the Johnson years, the possibility arose that some campaign excesses could be quietly laid to rest and the broad policy of the Department continued, with or without a seemingly new name or new direction. That possibility still exists, and there is evidence that Secretary Finch understands well the dangers of in fact reversing course. He is known to be fully aware that to let the last-ditch-stand crowd triumph in the Southern school cases would be to encourage further defiance, to embarrass those who have tried to meet the guidelines at some expense to their own local standing, and to undo a lot of work already done. None of this is to say that the Department's obligation is a punitive one or that it should be guided by some retaliatory urge. On the contrary, the Department's obligation is to use the tools at its disposal—including the threat or fact of cutoff—to achieve compliance. That would appear to be what Secretary Finch is trying to do; one can only hope that he succeeds.

Crime Curb

Judge Oliver Gasch's ruling that the District Council has power to enact a firearms control ordinance clears the way, at least in part, for application of one of the most effective curbs on crime. The judge has not put the stamp of judicial approval on the terms of the ordinance adopted by the Council; he has merely said that the Council possesses some power, the reach of which has yet to be determined, to act in this field. When the Council initially enacted this ordinance last fall, Judge Aubrey Robinson granted an injunction delaying application of its terms until Jan. 12 and then extended the stay for an additional month to Feb. 12 on the ground that inadequate time had been allowed for compliance. In the interim—just a few days ago, in fact—the Council adopted some clarifying and perfecting amendments assuring ample time for compliance.

The aim of the ordinance seems to us thoroughly sensible and salutary. It calls for the registration of all firearms in the District of Columbia—a requirement no more onerous and no more embarrassing to honest men than the requirement that they register their automobiles, their dogs and even their marriages. But to dishonest men, the ordinance could prove extremely uncomfortable, for it would make it more difficult than at present for them to purchase a gun of any kind and extremely risky to possess a gun without registering it.

The ordinance also calls for a police permit or license to possess a rifle or shotgun. Thus anyone caught in the commission of a crime carrying one of these weapons without a license will be guilty of an additional offense. It is often said that only the law-abiding will abide by this ordinance and that criminals will ignore it. This is true, of course, of any provision of law. It is to say no more than that crime is committed only by criminals. To make it a crime for anyone to possess, without a registration certificate or a license, weapons virtually indispensable to the commission of an important catalogue of crimes is to pose an effective curb on crime. Sportsmen, target shooters and responsible householders will not suffer from this ordinance. And the community will be safer when it goes into effect.

Denial of Lobbying

American Airlines was completely surprised by President Nixon's Jan. 24 decision to reopen the Transpacific Route Case and had not "lobbied for" or recommended such action by the President, as alleged in the Evans and Novak column (The Washington Post, Jan. 31). No one in American Airlines has been "scouting" for a law firm with Republican connections; and specifically American has made no contact with the firm of Royall, Koegel and Rogers. We have also ascertained that this firm has no knowledge of any approach by American.

High Adventure

As The Washington Post pointed out, the new administration does not yet have a fancy slogan. In rereading the text of the President's Inaugural Address, I was again struck by one rather snappy phrase in which Mr. Nixon appealed to the citizenry "to join in a high adventure—one as rich as humanity itself and exciting as the times we live in."

The President cannot in good conscience ask his fellow Americans to face the problems of the years to come with hearty optimism; conversely, to confront the future with grim spirits is self-defeating. But to ask people to channel their mental outlook into one of adventure seems to strike a delicate balance.

The concept of adventure seems to have died away with the Gold Rush. Isn't it about time this spirit was revitalized? The exploration of finding new ways to deal with old issues should not be only challenging but exciting as well. Aren't challenge and excitement the essence of adventure?

President Nixon's High Adventure? Well, why not?

Gun Control in N.Va.

Last summer President Nixon expressed the opinion that gun control legislation should be the responsibility of state and local governments. Fairfax County will soon have an opportunity to fulfill this responsibility by adopting legislation that will help curb the rising rate of firearm deaths and firearm crimes in this area.

One glance at any recent newspaper shows that present gun laws are hopelessly inadequate. Fairfax County needs a system whereby each gun owner is properly trained and tested before he receives a license. Each firearm should be registered so that the owner can be held responsible for each gun he possesses, for every fatal bullet shot by one of his firearms, intentionally or by accident. (Cost of registration has been estimated at less than 25 cents per gun.)

Early February a Special Advisory Committee on Gun Control will present to the Fairfax County Board its final report and recommendation. It was disturbing to learn that certain members of this committee seem more concerned about promoting the popular use of firearms than about curbing their misuse. It has been suggested that the Fairfax County School Board provide firearm instruction in public schools just as it has drivers' education. Will guns become the next status symbol among today's teenagers?

During the first nine months of 1968 Fairfax County recorded the following firearm incidents: 6 gun murders; 59 robberies by gun; 50 felonious assaults by gun; 12 suicides by gun. When the issue is brought up again in February it is hoped that the Board of Supervisors will recognize the need for stricter gun control in Fairfax County and act accordingly.

Grape Workers' Demands

Matt Triggs, assistant legislative director of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in his letter which you published on Jan. 7, said that the issue in the national grape boycott is a union contract demand "which would require all workers to join the union whether they wanted to or not."

The truth is that the only demand facing the growers is that they recognize the union for purposes of bargaining on matters affecting hours, wages and working conditions of table grape growers.

Bishops, rabbis, ministers, legislators, mayors, public officials and captains of industry, all and at different times, have offered their good offices to the growers to bring the two groups — management and labor — together simply to see if there is some mutually acceptable machinery for ending the strike and boycott. These growers have turned down each and every approach and for over three years have refused to meet with any leader of the Farm Workers Union under any condition.

Mr. Triggs cannot produce a single grower of table grapes who has had the question of union membership in any form presented as a union contract demand. The only table grapes grown under a union contract are DiGiorgio Corporation grapes, and the clause was placed in the contract by a third party arbitrator.

While I do not have access to industry figures and reports, I believe Mr. Triggs has misrepresented the effectiveness of the boycott. If the strike is such a flop and the national boycott is ineffective—as he says—then why has the Farm Bureau so aggressively taken up the "plight" of the growers? Why did the Farm Bureau feel compelled to make the boycott the focal issue of its recent national convention? Why has the Farm Bureau seen fit to lock arms with the National Right-to-Work Committee, the table grape growers and the labor contractors, who traffic in human misery, to forge another link in the chains that bind farm workers to a life of frustration and privation?

Our national labor policy relegates farm workers to second-class citizenship. They are faced with the choice of accepting second-class citizenship or struggling to obtain first-class citizenship through whatever procedures are open to them. The strike and boycott are the only way. There is nothing else they can do.

New Vietnam Note?

In your concern for Mr. Nixon's Middle East posture and his views on armaments during his first press conference, you missed the key note of a foreign policy change of heart with regard to Vietnam. Namely, "when you have a guerrilla war, in which one side may not even be able to control many of those who are responsible for the violence in the area . . ." Which is something, in spite of seating the NLF in Paris, Mr. Rusk & Co. never admitted. As a matter of fact, they adamantly maintained that the NLF always was the puppet of Hanoi. Contrary to the previous administration, Mr. Nixon may be looking at the facts.

KEVIN J. KINSELLA
Washington

[illegible] facts, all obtained from overt, public sources:

On Nov. 2, 1966, the day President Johnson left Seoul after a state visit, the North Koreans ambushed and killed six American and one South Korean soldier in the southern portion of the demilitarized zone that divides Korea.

That was the first incident in a marked upsurge of flagrant violations of the Korean armistice and clearly aggressive actions by the North Koreans.

During 1967, the North Koreans killed 131 American and South Korean soldiers and wounded 294 more in attacks along and below the DMZ. There were a total of 445 firefights along the DMZ, plus more in the South Korean interior.

Moreover, two American camps were shot up. There were artillery exchanges and at least one small tank battle. Two railroad trains were sabotaged.

At sea, numerous South Korean fishing vessels were captured. A South Korean patrol boat was blown out of the water by North Korean ships similiar to those that attacked the Pueblo. There were other exchanges of fire inside and outside territorial waters, north and south of an imaginary extension of the DMZ.

In December, 1967, North Korean Premier Kim Il-sung reiterated in the clearest terms the North Korean intention to reunify all of Korea under Communist domination by force of arms. It was the third time that he personally had done so and each time he emphasized that American forces were the target of priority.

On Jan. 6, 1968, five days before Pueblo left Japan, and again on Jan. 11, the day the ship sailed, North Korean broadcasts warned against spy ships off their coast and said they were determined to take counter measures.

MOST FLAGRANT of all, the North Koreans sent 31 men into Seoul in an attempt to assassinate South Korean President Park Chung Hee. This blatant evidence of North Korean belligerence occurred on the night of Jan. 21—a full 36 hours before the Pueblo was seized. It would be interesting to know whether Bucher had been apprised of it.

He may not have been for all three experienced naval officers testified that, in effect, they had no idea the North Koreans were in a threatening mood and would violate the freedom of the high seas, just as they had violated so much on land and at sea before.

Nor have the five admirals on the board of inquiry delved deeply into this point. Rear Adm. Marshall W. White asked Adm. John son whether the DMZ intrusions had not made him think the same thing might happen at sea—"a so-called crossing of the DMZ in the water."

Johnson replied that the chances were so remote "a bookmaker would give you such fantastic odds that even someone as rich as Howard Hughes could not pay off on it."

No one could have predicted, of course, exactly what the North Koreans might do, any more than any other event can be predicted. Gen. Charles H. Bonesteel III, the commander of American forces in South Korea and a perspective student of his North Korean adversaries, has often called Kim Il-sung a "meglomaniac" and said he would never try to guess what Kim would do next.

One might also have been surprised at the audacity of the North Korean seizure of the Pueblo. But little could have been more audacious for North Korea than to send armed soldiers into South Korea to assassinate the President.

But the basic question remains, in light of all the other evidence: What made everyone so sure that the North Koreans would not try it?

Facing Facts

Nixon's Team Is Trying to Determine What's Really Happening in Vietnam

By Joseph Kraft

THE NIXON Administration has not yet fully formulated its policy for Vietnam. But in one critical area, the new men have decisively parted company with the practices of the Johnson Administration.

They are not kidding themselves, or the country, with rosy progress reports. Instead of merely spouting statistics and homilies designed to justify past actions, they are making a systematic effort to determine what is really happening in Vietnam.

THIS WILLINGNESS to face facts, even unpleasant facts, finds a notable expression in what President Nixon himself said about a cease-fire at his first White House news conference. In the past, a cease-fire in Vietnam was airily included in the official line as a distinct possibility.

How could it not be? The seat of all the trouble was supposed to be an invasion of South Vietnam by North Vietnam. A settlement required only that the North leave its neighbor in the South alone. Once that happened, a cease-fire was child's play.

Mr. Nixon came off this nonsense with a vengeance. By reference to a guerrilla struggle, he implicity recognized that the insurgents had deep local roots all over Vietnam. By reference to the possibility that "one side may not even be able to control many of those who are responsible for the violence," he discreetly surfaced some doubts as to whether the regime in Saigon was all that peace-minded.

Then he went on to tell the truth about how much of an illusion it was to expect a cease-fire. He said: "I think it is not helpful in discussing Vietnam to use such terms as cease-fire, because cease-fire is a term of art that really has no relevance, in my opinion, to a guerrilla war."

IN KEEPING with the new President's appetite for the facts, there has been a significant change in the flow of Vietnam information to the White House. President Johnson depended on his special assistant for national security affairs, Walt Rostow, a fervent partisan of the Vietnam involvement. Rostow in turn looked to a unit in the Central Intelligence Agency headed by George Carver.

Nobody doubts Carver's knowledge of Vietnam or his basic competence. But according to a wide variety of officials in both the Defense and State Departments, the Carver unit largely served up to Rostow what he wanted to hear.

Thus before the Tet offensive of last year, its evaluations were apparently very optimistic about the progress being made in subduing the insurgency. These reports justified the continuing military effort on the ground that success was not too far away.

Subsequent to Tet, the Carver unit apparently filled the air with predictions of a second and third and fourth wave of attacks by the other side. The effect of these reports was to put a discount on the Paris peace talks on the theory that the other side was only using the talks as a stalling device while winding up for a knockout blow on the ground.

Rostow's replacement at the White House, Henry Kissinger, has from the beginning sought to bring on to his staff a capacity for critical evaluation of the intelligence reports. The man he originally sought—one of Carver's chief critics—was not available.

In the end, Kissinger took on his staff a former CIA man, Dean Moore. But Moore was not a member of the Carver unit. He is known to his colleagues at the agency and at the Departments of Defense and State as a top-flight analyst without any bias.

ALL THIS, to be sure, does not add up to anything like a change in policy. But the ground is plainly being laid for change if conditions are found to warrant it. True toughmindedness, a disposition to face facts and to be skeptical and analytical, is at last being substituted for that ultimate expression of romantic sentimentality which caused so many leading figures in the Johnson Administration to equate fighting a war that could not be won with hardheaded realism.

Lobby Swapping

Clients Must Be Reconvinced You Can Open the Doors

By Art Buchwald

ONE OF THE groups most affected by the change from a Democratic Administration to a Republican one is the lobbyists of vested interests. Having wined and dined Democrats for the past eight years, the Capital's lobbyists must now convince their clients that they are in as solid with the Nixon people as they were with the Kennedy and Johnson appointees.

I HAPPENED to stop in to visit a lobbyist friend of mine to find out how he was doing. He was talking on the phone as I was ushered in. "Don't worry about a thing, Mr. Blathering. As luck would have it, my sister went to school with Pat Nixon . . . No, they weren't in the same class but they used to pass each other in the hall all the time . . . What do you mean I told you five years ago my sister went to school with Lady Bird Johnson? . . . I did? . . . Oh, yeh, that was my other sister . . . You see, I have two sisters . . . Mr. Blathering, I assure you there isn't a member of the Nixon Administration that I couldn't get on the phone right now . . . Yes, sir, I'll call you back."

to know that some day he'd be Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare?"

"What good is talking to him now?"

"I'm going to explain to him the letter got lost, and I don't want him to think I forgot."

"Do you believe he'll buy that?"

"I guess not," he said, discouraged. "But I have to think of something to convince my clients I've got influence with the Nixon Administration. If I could only get invited to one of those Billy Graham prayer sessions at the White House."

"They're not open to the public," I said.

"IT REALLY doesn't seem fair," he said. "You work with people for eight years, you get to know their wives and their kids, you build up close personal relationships, and then, zap, they go and change administrations, and you have to start all over again with a whole new set of friends."

"I guess you can't stay friends with people after they're out of the Government," I said.

Alabama Challenge

Incumbent Governor May Buck Wallace In 1970 Battle to Lead State

By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak

A BITTER struggle now building up behind the scenes in Alabama between Gov. Albert Brewer and former Gov. George Wallace now points to a Wallace-Brewer clash for the governorship in 1970.

Brewer got to his present position as a loyal Wallace lieutenant. As speaker of the Alabama House, Brewer was his losing presidential campaign last year.

The Governor's explanation to intimates seems too simple: He wants the study for his archives. But the only other explanation—that he is eyeing a possible third presidential race in 1972 or 1976 (when he will turn 68)—seems preposterous.

The Paris Mood

Americans Generally Expect Compromise After Months of Negotiations

By Chalmers M. Roberts

PARIS—A reporter coming to Paris finds what he left behind in Washington, a seeming paradox involved in the negotiations to end the Vietnam war. On the one hand is the expectation of months of grueling negotiations with the Communists. On the other, however, is a general American belief that in the end a compromise acceptable to the big majority of Americans is both possible and probable.

Henry Cabot Lodge, President Nixon's No. 1 man on the scene here, is ensconced in a corner suite at the Hotel Crillon across the street from his Embassy office and a block from an indoor swimming pool he uses to keep in trim. Lodge's chief antagonist, North Vietnamese politburo member Le Duc Tho, lives in a well-walled villa outside the city limits not far from Orly Airport. Both men, along with the heads of the South Vietnamese and National Liberation Front delegations, are making themselves comfortable for what most diplomats and observers figure will be a long spring, summer and probably fall if not winter.

JUDGING from the two sessions thus far of this four-delegation conference, which is either two-sided or four-sided depending on how you want to view it, there will be many polemical sessions. But everybody knows that at some point—an optimistic guess would be within a month—private meetings will get under way at which the serious business will in time take place.

There is a vast difference in attitude between this conference and the 1954 Geneva Conference, which finally ended the Indochina War. The United States then was supplying only money and equipment and it could, and did, wash its hands of the whole affair when John Foster Dulles decided he would not be a party to "losing" Indochina. This time, the United States cannot walk away and every sign, both in Washington and Paris, among the Nixon men is that the new Administration believes it can find, and is working toward, that acceptable compromise.

The name of the game here is the political future of South Vietnam. While the Nixon Administration has picked up where the Johnson Administration left off by asking first for resolution of such military problems as the demilitarized zone and mutual troop withdrawals, there are no illusions that military and political issues can be separately compartmentalized. On that point, there is a general American belief that there will indeed be a final piece of paper with signatures. The expectation as of now, however, is that it will contain some important vagueness designed to fudge parts of the political issue.

THE POLITICAL issue is simply this: How much will each side risk its fate and fortunes to a future political struggle within South Vietnam if and when external forces of the United States and North Vietnam pull out or are in the process of doing so? If there is to be a political settlement in some form, both sides will have to agree to risk taking, since each side knows it cannot enforce its total will by force of arms.

The problem here is how to allot to the Communists a role in the political life of the South commensurate with their actual strength, not the maximum strength they claim or the minimum strength credited them by the Saigon government. As the Americans see it, given the present and potential state of the war, that would mean Communist representation in some form in the Saigon government but not so much representation as to insure that the Communists could automatically use it as a springboard to total power.

But the United States itself cannot assign representation. To do so over Saigon's objection would be to "impose" a coalition regime and the Nixon Administration, like the Johnson Administration, shows no signs of trying to do that. Instead, what will be required is bargaining in some manner between Saigon and the National Liberation Front (Vietcong).

THE WHOLE AFFAIR is a fearful tangle. But the evidence is that the United States has climbed down, or is in the process of climbing down, from the Dean Rusk formulation that all that is required is for the North to leave its Southern neighbor alone. The new crowd, both in Washington and in Paris, knows it must compromise. Saigon has been evolving toward compromise though no one there would admit it out loud. And Hanoi gives the appearance, for all its polemics, of knowing that if President Nixon sticks it out then the Communists too, including the NLF, must also compromise.

In short, behind the words one senses a basic mood. But it is going to take a long time to translate mood into agreement. The reader had better be prepared for rollercoaster ups and downs before the ride is over.

Our Semi-Annual Sale Is Still in Progress

Alabama Challenge

Incumbent Governor May Buck Wallace In 1970 Battle to Lead State

By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak

A BITTER struggle now building up behind the scenes in Alabama between Gov. Albert Brewer and former Gov. George Wallace now points to a Wallace-Brewer clash for the governorship in 1970.

Brewer got to his present position as a loyal Wallace lieutenant. As speaker of the Alabama House, Brewer was named by Wallace to run for lieutenant governor in 1966, the year Wallace's wife Lurleen was elected Governor.

Brewer became Governor himself when Mrs. Wallace died last year. Ever since, the Wallace-Brewer relationship has been souring, with Brewer asserting more and more independence.

Now Wallace wants Brewer to run for the governorship in 1970 as a member of Wallace's American Independent Party, setting the stage in Alabama for Wallace to make another run for President on his third-party ticket.

Brewer is bucking. Somewhat reserved when he first took over the governorship, he now glories in his job. He is in no mood to run as a Wallace stooge.

The possible result: A smash-bang, headon gubernatorial battle between Democrat Brewer and third-party candidate Wallace with some politicians giving Brewer, incredibly, a tiny chance.

Running third would be Republican James Martin, the former Congressman who was beaten by Lurleen Wallace in 1966 and wants another crack at the governorship.

Rarick Purge

BESIDES humiliating Speaker John McCormack and the regular Democratic leadership, the vote by the House Democratic caucus to strip seniority from Wallaceite Rep. John Rarick of Louisiana buried the myth that liberals do better on a secret ballot.

Veteran leaders in the Democratic Study Group (DSG) well remembered 1965, when they counted a 40-vote bulge in the caucus to deprive Goldwater Democrats of seniority but, in fact, squeezed by with only 15 votes on a secret ballot.

In private discussions among DSG leaders, consequently, it was decided to go for an open roll call vote (a motion successfully made by Rep. Richard Bolling of Missouri). Wobbly Northern moderates exposed to public view had to vote against Rarick, and the liberals won by a surprising 28 votes.

A footnote: The Rarick loss could prove a setback in the leadership ambitions of Rep. Daniel Rostenkowski of Illinois, the majority caucus chairman, who backed McCormack while his Illinois colleagues voted with the DSG. Simultaneously, it boosted the stock of the new DSG chairman, Rep. Donald Fraser of Minnesota, who led the Rarick purge.

Rocky's Archives?

REPUBLICAN politicians puzzle as to why Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York has asked key 1968 aides to send him exhaustive critiques of his losing presidential campaign last year.

The Governor's explanation to intimates seems too simple: He wants the study for his archives. But the only other explanation—that he is eyeing a possible third presidential race in 1972 or 1976 (when he will turn 68)—seems preposterous.

Industrialist J. Irwin Miller, who headed Citizens for Rockefeller last spring, has submitted his study of where the campaign went wrong. So have other aides, including some who handled the nuts-and-bolts traveling operation.

One criticism: The Governor's relations with the press and television, a function of Press Secretary Leslie Slote, were poor, particularly just before and during the Miami Beach convention.

McLuhan in Virginia

VIRGINIA politics, until recently mired in horse-and-buggy procedures, will be jarred this year by a master of McLuhanite media techniques: Joe Napolitan, who directed the brilliant Humphrey media campaign last fall.

Napolitan, a protege of former Democratic National Chairman Lawrence F. O'Brien, has been retained by one of the three candidates in this year's red-hot Democratic primary for Governor. What's surprising is that Napolitan's client is Lt. Gov. Fred Pollard, the conservative in the field (the other two: moderate William Battle and liberal State Sen. Henry Howell).

Napolitan will find it no easy task to turn the colorless Pollard into a vibrant TV personality. Pollard is now considered to be running third and likely to miss the primary election runoff. But Napolitan performed the impossible in Alaska last spring when Mike Gravel upset the veteran Ernest Gruening for the Senate nomination.

Stock Market Powder Keg

By Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson

THE SECURITIES and Exchange Commission and the Nation's stockbrokers are sitting unhappily on a powder keg that potentially could explode into perhaps the greatest stock market crash in history.

It is the pile-up of paperwork in brokerage back offices, which has left thousands and perhaps millions of investors holding empty bags of broker IOUs valued in hundreds of millions of dollars. Brokers could not make good if they were pressed to do so.

Both the SEC and stock exchange officials are aware of the catastrophic danger they face. But the problem is so vast and complex that neither the SEC, which is the guardian of the public interest, nor the exchanges have been willing or able to cope with it.

There's been much publicity in recent months about the paperwork jam in brokerage houses. The New York Stock Exchange, prodded by the SEC, has made several efforts to solve it, first by cutting out Wednesday as a trading day, now by trading only four hours a day five days a week. The purpose was to give the back-office workers a chance to cut down on the gigantic backlog of record-keeping involved in daily transfers of millions of shares of stock.

But what has not been publicized is the fact that in the tremendous foulup, many records have been lost and, even if those surviving could be straightened out, large individual brokerage houses could find themselves with multimillion-dollar deficits in their accounts.

About a year ago, a very small brokerage house in New York caved in under its backlog difficulties. When all the chips had been counted, it had a $2-million deficit in its customer accounts that could not be traced or explained.

More recently, Hayden, Stone, Inc., one of the Nation's largest brokers, revealed some of the difficulties it has been experiencing by announcing it was taking major further steps to fight its way out of its own particular tangle.

Last month the firm said it had arranged for massive new capital funds in another step toward handling its problems and said it was going to seek more business from larger investors because their accounts presented relatively less operating difficulties than those of small investors.

Significantly, Hayden, Stone announced that as of last Aug. 30 it had set aside $16 million as a "prudent provision" against possible losses stemming from the backlog problem. A year earlier—before daily trading on the New York Stock Exchange reached its current tremendous volume—its reserve for such losses was only $3.4 million.

But the fact is, according to informed Wall Street experts, that hardly any brokerage house knows what those potential losses may be, records of daily transactions being as fouled up as they are.

ACCORDING to stock exchange rules, when a customer buys stock through a broker he must be given that stock—and pay for it—within five days.

But many stock buyers who do frequent buying and selling don't want delivery; they leave the stock "on deposit" with their brokers, rather than having to store it themselves. Their brokers then are able to use the stock to make deliveries to other customers who actually want delivery.

But when a stockbroker makes a purchase for a customer, the broker pays for it at the time, to be reimbursed by the customer on delivery later.

The reason the situation is so dangerous is that should all of any broker's customers start demanding the stock they bought five days ago, the broker's records would not show what customers he owed or which owed him.

And since his capital assets could not possibly cover the values of his stock transactions over any period of time, he would be in the position of a bank short on cash and unable to pay all depositors on demand—the classic cause of runs on banks and an equally potent threat to stockbrokers.

THEORETICALLY, the stock exchanges are supposed to regulate the brokerage business so as to protect the interests of investors as well as those of member firms. But the exchanges would tend to put member interests above those of the public, so that the self-regulation of the stock business is something short of ideal.

The Securities and Exchange Commission, however, is in a different position. Its sole responsibility is to protect the public. It has the power to do so. It could force stockbrokers, directly and indirectly, either to improve operating methods or reduce trading to levels they can handle.

The big question in both Wall Street and Washington is why the SEC has failed to move in.

One explanation is that it is fearful of alarming the investing public and risking a Wall Street crash. Since the situation has been developing for about two years, the SEC hoped the stock exchanges and individual stockbrokers would act to avert catastrophe on their own. But they haven't. Yet the SEC has done virtually nothing to prod them.

"No, sir. I've called him 12 times."

My friend said, "Keep calling."

"What's with Finch?" I asked.

"It's a long story. In 1966, I got a letter from Finch asking me to contribute to his campaign for lieutenant governor of California. I threw the letter in the waste-paper basket."

"That was a stupid thing to do," I said.

"You can, but why would you want to?"

"You have a point," I agreed. "Where do you think your biggest problem is going to be?"

"Probably in Defense. David Packard is Under Secretary of Defense and my problem is, what can a lobbyist do for a man who has $300 million?"

The secretary came back in. "It's Mr. Blathering again. He wants to know if you met anybody yet."

My friend was perspiring. "Hi there, Mr. Blathering . . . No, I haven't heard from Bob Finch, but I think I have a breakthrough. It turns out my kid and Secretary of Defense Mel Laird's 14-year-old kid are on the same baseball team at Landon . . . how do you like that for coincidence? . . . Please don't be so nervous, Mr. Blathering . . . Of course I'm aware of your problem . . . I'll take it up with the Attorney General on Monday."

He called Attorney General Mitchell's office and spoke to his secretary. "Hi there, my name is Grumbottom and my sister used to go to school with the Attorney General's wife . . ."

Nixon's Cabinet-to-Be

Here, with special attention to their labor records, are the 12 men who will manage the Federal Government for the next President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon.

William P. Rogers, 55
State

Senior partner in New York and Washington law firm of Royall, Koegel, Rogers and Wells since 1961. Served as Assistant District Attorney of New York County before and after service in Navy during World War II. Counsel to Senate Special Committee to Investigate National Defense program in 1947. Returned to private practice in 1950. Supported Eisenhower and Nixon in 1952. Under President Eisenhower, he was Deputy Attorney General then, in 1957, Attorney General.

Rogers was chief American delegate in 1955 to United Nations conference on prison conditions and the treatment of offenders. Served on American delegation to the 20th United Nations General Assembly in 1965-1966. Some experience as international corporation lawyer. Is a long-time director of the American Foundation on Automation and Employment, Inc. (IAM President Roy Siemiller is Co-Chairman of the Foundation.)

David M. Kennedy, 63
Treasury

Chairman of Continental Illinois National Bank and Trust Co. of Chicago, nation's eighth bank, since 1959. Staff employee, Federal Reserve Board, for 16 years starting in 1930. Went from there to Continental. Under President Eisenhower, he served as assistant to former Treasury Secretary George M. Humphrey, 1953-1954.

Kennedy was early backer of 10 per cent Federal surtax on incomes. On federal spending he said, "We are discovering that we cannot simultaneously fight a major war, provide economic and military assistance for many other countries and still expect to expand our activities at home." On Dec. 13, said there is such a thing as an "acceptable deficit," one that would not put excessive pressures on credit supplies or create inflation problems. He has served as economic advisor to Chicago's Democratic Mayor Richard Daley.

Melvin R. Laird, 46
Defense

U.S. Representative from Wisconsin since 1953. Served in U.S. Navy, Pacific Third Fleet during World War II. Third ranking Republican on Housing Appropriations Committee, serving on Defense, Health, Education, Welfare and Labor subcommittees. Supported Landrum-Griffin Bill. MNPL recorded his vote on 80 key issues during his 16 years in Congress. Laird's record: 73 "wrong" votes, 7 "right" votes.

Laird was chairman of 1964 Republican Convention Committee which wrote Goldwater's platform. One of GOP's most vigorous advocates of a strong defense force. Has campaigned for nuclear navy, strong, anti-submarine force, more Polaris missile submarines, and increased research and development for defense.

Winton M. Blount, 47
Postmaster General

President, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, since July, 1968. Heads construction firm, Blount Brothers Corp., a union firm. Started firm, with his brother, after Air Force service in World War II, by investing $28,000 in earth-moving equipment. Firm now a multi-million dollar enterprise. It built Saturn launch complex at Cape Kennedy, several missile defense installations and industrial plants.

Blount campaigned for Nixon in 1960, but refused to support Goldwater in 1964. Was not active politically in 1968 campaign, saying his position with the Chamber of Commerce ruled out political activity.

Building trades representatives say relations with Blount have been good.

George P. Shultz, 48
Labor

Dean, Graduate School of Business, University of Chicago, since 1962. Marine veteran of World War II. Taught industrial relations at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Co-chairman, Automation Fund Committee, a joint effort by Meat Cutters Union and Armour & Co. to find solutions to the problems of automation in the meat packing industry. Has arbitrated labor disputes in several industries including electrical equipment, farm implements, textiles, chemicals, food products and metal fabricating. Under Eisenhower, he served on President's Council of Economic Advisors. He is now president, Industrial Relations Research Assn., and a director of Borg-Warner Corp. and General American Transportation Corp.

Shultz's selection as Labor Secretary approved by most Chicago trade union officers. After his appointment he said, "The real experts on what's good for a union and its members and what's good for management and its group are the people in the unions and management. It's up to them to work out answers to their problems." Also: "The American economy is much too complex and market forces much too powerful for the application of a simple wage-price guideline."

Walter J. Hickel, 49
Interior

Governor of Alaska since 1967, his first elective office. Born in Kansas, moved to Alaska in 1940. Worked as dishwasher, bartender, carpenter and building inspector. One time professional boxer. Member Carpenters union, Anchorage, from 1950 to 1953; dropped for nonpayment of dues. Started own contracting and real estate business. Also owns several hotels.

Hickel opposed Federal law requiring all shipping between American ports be done in American-built ships. Found way to get around that law so State of Alaska could purchase $7,000,000 Swedish ferry. First supported Rockefeller for President, but switched to Nixon in March, 1968.

John N. Mitchell, 55
Attorney General

A senior partner in New York law firm of Nixon, Mudge, Rose, Guthrie, Alexander and Mitchell since 1967. Mitchell's firm merged with Nixon's in January, 1967. An expert on law relating to state and municipal bonds, he helped shape many of Nelson Rockefeller's revenue-raising proposals in New York State. A PT Boat Commander in World War II.

Managed Nixon's Presidential campaign in 1968. No recorded position on matters of national concern. The Nixon law firm represented General Cigar Co. in dispute with IAM in Puerto Rico. It charged IAM representatives with using witchcraft to influence workers.

Robert H. Finch, 43
Health, Education & Welfare

Lieutenant Governor of California since 1967. A lawyer. Marine veteran, World War II, Korea. Ran unsuccessfully for Congress twice. Became administrative assistant to Vice President Nixon in 1958. Managed Nixon's campaign for President, 1960. Worked in Nixon campaign for Governor of California, 1962. Campaign manager for U.S. Sen. Murphy of California, 1964.

John A. Volpe, 60
Transportation

Governor of Massachusetts since 1964. Worked as hod carrier and plasterer while in college. Holds card in Plasterers union. Formed John A. Volpe Construction Co., in 1933, a multi-million dollar union shop contractor. Built Carpenters Union Building in Washington, D.C. Now constructing headquarters for Dept. of Transportation.

Elected governor, 1960; defeated in 1962, re-elected in 1964 and 1966. Originally a Rockefeller supporter, switched to Nixon and ran in state primary last year as Nixon's stand-in. Rockefeller defeated him in a write-in campaign. Was Federal Highway Administrator under Eisenhower.

Maurice H. Stans, 60
Commerce

President of Glore, Forgan, William R. Steats (New York investment bank) since 1965. An accountant, he helped build one of the nation's largest accounting firms, Alexander Grant & Co. Under President Eisenhower, he was Deputy Postmaster General, 1955, and Budget Director, 1957.

Stans says a balanced budget should be first order of government's business. As Budget Director he fought a tax reduction designed to expand output and increase employment during 1959-1960 recession. Headed fund-raising for Nixon campaign.

Clifford M. Hardin, 53
Agriculture

Chancellor, University of Nebraska, since 1954. A college administrator for the last 27 years. He helped administer agricultural training programs in South America, Japan and Okinawa. Not identified with any set agricultural policy or farm organization. Has predicted that the trend toward fewer farms and fewer farm workers will continue.

George Romney, 61
Housing & Urban Development

Governor of Michigan since 1963. Gained nation-wide acclaim as President of American Motors Corp., Kenosha, Wis. Had a good record in labor relations as an employer. Michigan labor opposed him in his campaigns for Governor. As Governor, Romney promoted the co-author of anti-union Landrum-Griffin Act, Robert P. Griffin, to U.S. Senate.

Romney has advocated extension of anti-trust laws to trade unions and outlawing industry-wide bargaining. Spoke at Republican convention last year regretting failure of GOP platform to deal with what he called the "growth and concentration of excessive collective bargaining power in hands of excessively powerful union and employer groups."

Air Transport

Air taxi firms warned on rising accident rate

The nation's top transportation safety official has rapped the rapidly expanding air taxi industry for its rising accident rate.

Before the recent National Air Taxi Conference at Hollywood, Fla., Joseph J. O'Connell, Jr., chairman of the National Transportation Safety Board, told the operators their accident statistics were "not encouraging."

O'Connell reported that total accidents involving air taxis increased 15 per cent from 1964 to 1965, 13.5 per cent from 1965 to 1966 and 7.3 per cent from 1966 to 1967.

Fatal accidents rose 8.7 per cent from 1964 to 1965, remained unchanged from 1965 to 1966 and increased nearly one-third from 1966 to 1967. In 1967, there were 33 fatal accidents and 201 non-fatal mishaps involving air taxis.

O'Connell expressed disappointment that the Federal Aviation Administration, the Civil Aeronautics Board and the major airlines haven't done much to help air taxi operators set up safety programs.

He also said he was "disturbed by the absence of any reference to safety" in a recent announcement of a pending merger between the National Air Taxi Conference and the Association of Commuter Airlines. Other problems were mentioned, he noted, but not safety. He declared:

"Every black hole in the ground hurts all of you economically and hurts public confidence in your new industry."

Hi-jacked airliners—Airline unions from free nations around the world are going to press their governments to ratify an international pact that could help cut down the hi-jacking of airliners.

Frank Heisler, IAM airline coordinator and chairman of the aviation safety committee of the International Transport Workers Federation, reported that this was agreed upon at the committee's recent meeting in London.

The unions will press their governments to ratify an agreement signed by 29 nations at the 1963 Tokyo conference of the International Civil Aviation Organization. However, so far, only six nations—Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Portugal, the Philippines and Nationalist China have ratified. It takes 12 nations to put it into effect.

The agreement—called a convention—would make it compulsory for any nation ratifying to return hi-jacked aircraft, passengers and crew as rapidly as possible. It would also encourage prosecution of aircraft hi-jackers.

The spate of hi-jackings to Cuba and the recent prolonged detention of a hi-jacked Israeli airliner and crew in Algeria has inspired this action, Heisler said.

He said the IAM will ask the new Conference of Transportation Trades uniting all AFL-CIO transport unions to press the U.S. Senate to ratify this agreement in the coming session of Congress. Like a treaty, the pact needs only Senate ratification.

Curiously, Heisler reported, although the United States signed this agreement more than five years ago, the Administration never sent it to the Senate for ratification until last September. It is now pending before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

FAA Symposium—Seven IAM members at the recent FAA Maintenance Symposium at Oklahoma City, had more first-hand experience with the conference topic than most other delegates. The subject was "Man in the Maintenance Reliability System," the human element involved in airline safety.

IAM delegates included Grand Lodge Rep. Jack Carter, G. S. Berry and John Stillwell of Local 1781, San Francisco, United Air Lines mechanics; Assistant General Chairman Lee Harris of District 141; and George Braun, Los Angeles, Joe LaTorre, Kansas City, and Frank Flood, New York City, all District 142 members on TWA.

Ryan

Government

A hopeful look at the next four years

Under President-elect Nixon progress will probably be slower for Federal employees. That is the prediction of Grand Lodge Rep. William H. Ryan, coordinator of the IAM Government Employees Department.

Ryan reports that the Nixon Administration appears to be more conservative on Federal employee legislation. But the Senate and House Post Office and Civil Service Committees are expected to continue the drives for better wages, benefits and working conditions for federal workers.

Here is Ryan's outlook for the Federal workers in the Nixon Administration.

Wages—The size and number of wage adjustments after next July's guaranteed raise is anyone's guess. During his campaign, Nixon pledged to keep Federal salaries comparable with private industry.

Benefits—Pension improvements should lead the benefit gains. A new annuity computation schedule based on an average of a worker's highest three years instead of five and credit for unused sick leave, are said to stand good chances. Federal workers, however, will probably be paying a bigger part of their retirement bill.

Collective bargaining—Any revisions in Executive Order 10988 now appear dead. Nixon has voiced his support of legislation providing for collective bargaining for Federal employees instead of the present provisions of an Executive Order.

Ryan adds that the biggest issue under the Nixon Administration could be the contracting out of more government work to private industry. He explains that Nixon's closeness with big business upholds that speculation but hopes that the Democraitc Congress will hold the contracting reins.

Federal benefit lag—A new Labor Department study refutes the myth that Federal workers, while lagging in wages, do better in benefits than their counterparts in industry.

The report shows that 24.5 per cent of industry's labor costs per worker, goes to benefits. Uncle Sam pays only 23.8 per cent for benefits for each worker. Furthermore, the study shows the benefit gap has widened since 1963, in industry's favor.

According to the study, Uncle Sam is more generous in annual leave, holidays, and health and life insurance programs. Workers in industry lead in pensions, unemployment programs, and bonuses, and savings programs.

Right to strike—Richard McLaughlin, general counsel for the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, is the latest to make a suggestion on the issue of the right to strike by Federal employees. Speaking at a recent Chicago meeting of the National School Boards Assn., McLaughlin explained that a solution must be found that "is a little bit less than the right to strike and a little bit less than compulsory arbitration."

He suggested that an agency be established to mediate Federal employee disputes, much like the Mediation Service does in industry. His other suggestions included further steps such as limited strikes, work stoppages limited to 10, 30 or 60 days.

McLaughlin excluded even in his limited strike proposal, walkouts by Federal employees whose work affect public health, welfare or safety. He specifically named firemen, policemen and nurses.

IAM Santa steals show in Kenton, Ohio, caboose

That pink-cheeked, jolly old gentleman waving to the youngsters of Kenton, Ohio, from the platform of his special caboose is none other than George Engle, a member of IAM Local 1847.

Santa's miniature caboose was especially made and decorated by IAM members working at International Car Co. Kenton is known as "the caboose capital of the world," according to Harold Thaxton, IAM chairman at the plant.

International Car built the caboose as a civic project. It won the 'ohs' and 'ahs' of Kenton's kids, Thaxton says, but the real hit of the season was its red-robed, white-whiskered occupant.

Plaque

Sal F. Crivelli, left, field representative of the U.S. Dept. of Labor, former Secretary-Treasurer of IAM District 15, New York City, receives a plaque honoring his assistance to the Apprenticeship and Training Program in New York City. Nathan Erlich, center, and Frank Dutto, right, Chairman and Co-Chairman of the Apprenticeship Council, made the presentation, reports Murray Miller, Project Training Coordinator. Erlich said, "The success of this program to a great extent was due to Mr. Crivelli. It was Sal's patient guidance on the initial program that helped bear fruit."

Laurels

Ed Tims, Kansas City Southern Railroad machinist and a member of IAM District 18, displays the dahlias that won the first-place trophy in the dahlia show at Independence, Kan. Tims won a total of four trophies in all at the show, Gordon E. Wheatley, District 18 general chairman, reports.

Letter

Bernard Jacobson, a member of IAM Local 701, Chicago, recently received a letter from Hubert Humphrey, in response to birthday greetings he had sent the Vice President, a longtime friend. "There are many things for which I am grateful," wrote Mr. Humphrey, "and a very important one is your friendship."

Jacobson

Jacobson, who works for the Illinois Division of Highways, is editor of the Illinois Purple Heart News, and immediate past State Commander of the Military Order of the Purple Heart for Illinois. Jacobson was awarded his Purple Heart in 1945, while serving with the 75th Infantry in Germany.

STILL A CHANCE TO CHANGE THE FILIBUSTER RULE

The first attempt to get the new Senate to modify its Rule XXII and make it easier to end a filibuster failed last week. But the fight is not over. There is still a chance to change the rule within the next few days.

A Majority Can Close Debate

Though the attempt to change the rule failed, it has established an important precedent. Hubert H. Humphrey, who was still vice president, ruled in clear and unmistakable terms that a majority of the Senate at the opening of a new Congress can vote to limit debate.

The Senate procedure went like this:

The pending business before the Senate at the start of last week was a motion to take up the bi-partisan resolution (S. Res. 11) that would change Rule XXII so that instead of needing the votes of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting (67 if all 100 are there) to limit debate, only three-fifths would be needed (60 out of 100).

It was clear that the foes of change were going to filibuster this motion, so on Tuesday, January 14, Senator Frank Church (D., Idaho) filed a petition invoking cloture, a limit on debate.

Under the rules of the Senate, the petition that he and 24 other Democratic and Republican Senators filed, had to be voted on one hour after the Senate convened on Thursday, January 16. Their petition was supported by a vote of 51 to 47. Mr. Humphrey then ruled, as he had previously said he would, that since a majority of the Senate had voted to end debate, that was enough, at the opening of the 91st Congress, to limit further discussion on the motion to take up S. Res. 11.

Senator Spessard Holland (D., Fla.) then appealed Mr. Humphrey's ruling to the whole body. That appeal, Mr. Humphrey said, was undebateable. He put the appeal to an immediate vote and then the Senate refused to sustain him. It voted against his ruling, 53 to 45, since some of the Senators ready to vote to end debate were not ready to agree that a majority could do so. (Both votes mentioned are enclosed with this MEMO.)

Back to Another Cloture Vote

That left the situation where it was before: the motion to take up S. Res. 11 is still before the Senate. It remains the pending business even though Spiro T. Agnew succeeds Mr. Humphrey to the chair.

The Senators who feel the present Rule XXII is a grave obstruction to getting the work of the Senate done, are not giving up. Present plans call for the filing of another cloture petition on Friday, January 24. The vote on that would come Tuesday, January 28, one hour after the Senate convenes, probably at 1 P. M. At that time, however, old Rule XXII will be in operation and two-thirds of the Senators present will have to agree to limit debate if a filibuster is to be ended.

What Leadership Conference Groups Can Do

Last week's vote on Senator Holland's appeal shows that there are 51 votes for ending debate. Another 16 votes are needed.

You can help at this point by thanking the Senators who supported cloture all the way last week and urging those who didn't to close debate.

We urge the heads and representatives of participating organizations who will be in Washington next week for our annual Board meeting to plan to cone early. Spend the morning of the 28th visiting Senators and urge them to vote cloture so that the Senate can express its will on Rule XXII. Those who can't come should write and wire Senators urging the same course. Remember it took 10 years to pass the law backing the Supreme Court's 1954 school decision. Filibuster Rule XXII was the main obstacle.

Help change it by acting at once.

Senate Roll-Calls On Debate Curb

WASHINGTON, Jan. 16 (AP) —Following are two Senate roll-call votes today in the battle to revise the rule of closure so as to permit debate to be cut off by two-thirds of the Senators present and voting.

One vote was on a motion for closure of the debate about whether the Senate should take up the proposal for the rules change.

The other was on a motion to uphold Vice President Humphrey's ruling that, although the vote on closure lacked the two-thirds majority, it had been carried because a simple majority was sufficient to change the Senate rules at the start of a new Congress.

A TESTAMENT OF HOPE

in his final published statement, the fallen civil rights leader points the way out of america's racial turmoil into the promised land of true equality

BY DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

WHENEVER I AM ASKED my opinion of the current state of the civil rights movement, I am forced to pause; it is not easy to describe a crisis so profound that it has caused the most powerful nation in the world to stagger in confusion and bewilderment. Today's problems are so acute because the tragic evasions and defaults of several centuries have accumulated to disaster proportions. The luxury of a leisurely approach to urgent solutions—the ease of gradualism—was forfeited by ignoring the issues for too long. The nation waited until the black man was explosive with fury before stirring itself even to partial concern. Confronted now with the interrelated problems of war, inflation, urban decay, white backlash and a climate of violence, it is now forced to address itself to race relations and poverty, and it is tragically unprepared. What might once have been a series of separate problems now merge into a social crisis of almost stupefying complexity.

I am not sad that black Americans are rebelling; this was not only inevitable but eminently desirable. Without this magnificent ferment among Negroes, the old evasions and procrastinations would have continued indefinitely. Black men have slammed the door shut on a past of deadening passivity. Except for the Reconstruction years, they have never in their long history on American soil struggled with such creativity and courage for their freedom. These are our bright years of emergence; though they are painful ones, they cannot be avoided.

Yet despite the widening of our stride, history is racing forward so rapidly that the Negro's inherited and imposed disadvantages slow him down to an infuriating crawl. Lack of education, the dislocations of recent urbanization and the hardening of white resistance loom as such tormenting roadblocks that the goal sometimes appears not as a fixed point in the future but as a receding point never to be reached. Still, when doubts emerge, we can remember that only yesterday Negroes were not only grossly exploited but negated as human beings. They were invisible in their misery. But the sullen and silent slave of 110 years ago, an object of scorn at worst or of pity at best, is today's angry man. He is vibrantly on the move; he is forcing change, rather than waiting for it in pathetic futility. In less than two decades, he has roared out of slumber to change so many of his life's conditions that he may yet find the means to accelerate his march forward and overtake the racing locomotive of history.

These words may have an unexpectedly optimistic ring at a time when pessimism is the prevailing mood. People are often surprised to learn that I am an optimist. They know how often I have been jailed, how frequently the days and nights have been filled with frustration and sorrow, how bitter and dangerous are my adversaries. They expect these experiences to harden me into a grim and desperate man. They fail, however, to perceive the sense of affirmation generated by the challenge of embracing struggle and surmounting obstacles. They have no comprehension of the strength that comes from faith in God and man. It is possible for me to falter, but I am profoundly secure in my knowledge that God loves us; He has not worked out a design for our failure. Man has the capacity to do right as well as wrong, and his history is a path upward, not downward. The past is strewn with the ruins of the empires of tyranny, and each is a monument not merely to man's blunders but to his capacity to overcome them. While it is a bitter fact that in America in 1968, I am denied equality solely because I am black, yet I am not a chattel slave. Millions of people have fought thousands of battles to enlarge my freedom; restricted as it still is, progress has been made. This is why I remain an optimist, though I am also a realist, about the barriers before us. Why is the issue of equality still so far from solution in America, a nation that professes itself to be democratic, inventive, hospitable to new ideas, rich, productive and awesomely powerful? The problem is so tenacious because, despite its virtues and attributes, America is deeply racist and its democracy is flawed both economically and socially. All too many Americans believe justice will unfold painlessly or that its absence for black people will be tolerated tranquilly.

Justice for black people will not flow into society merely from court decisions nor from fountains of political oratory. Nor will a few token changes quell all the tempestuous yearnings of millions of disadvantaged black people. White America must recognize that justice for black people cannot be achieved without radical changes in the structure of our society. The comfortable, the entrenched, the privileged cannot continue to tremble at the prospect of change in the status quo.

Stephen Vincent Benét had a message for both white and black Americans in the title of a story, Freedom Is a Hard Bought Thing. When millions of people have been cheated for centuries, restitution is a costly process. Inferior education, poor housing, unemployment, inadequate health care—each is a bitter component of the oppression that has been our heritage. Each will require billions of dollars to correct. Justice so long deferred has accumulated interest and its cost for this society will be substantial in financial as well as human terms. This fact has not been fully grasped, because most of the gains of the past decade were obtained at bargain rates. The desegregation of public facilities cost nothing; neither did the election and appointment of a few black public officials.

The price of progress would have been high enough at the best of times, but we are in an agonizing national crisis because a complex of profound problems has intersected in an explosive mixture. The black surge toward freedom has raised justifiable demands for racial justice in our major cities at a time when all the problems of city life have simultaneously erupted. Schools, transportation, water supply, traffic and crime would have been municipal agonies whether or not Negroes lived in our cities. The anarchy of unplanned city growth was destined to confound our confidence. What is unique to this period is our inability to arrange an order of priorities that promises solutions that are decent and just.

Millions of Americans are coming to see that we are fighting an immoral war that costs nearly 30 billion dollars a year, that we are perpetuating racism, that we are tolerating almost 40,000,000 poor during an overflowing material abundance. Yet they remain helpless to end the war, to feed the hungry, to make brotherhood a reality; this has to shake our faith in ourselves. If we look honestly at the realities of our national life, it is clear that we are not marching forward; we are groping and stumbling; we are divided and confused. Our moral values and our spiritual confidence sink, even as our material wealth ascends. In these trying circumstances, the black revolution is much more than a struggle for the rights of Negroes. It is forcing America to face all its interrelated flaws—racism, poverty, militarism and materialism. It is exposing evils that are rooted deeply in the whole structure of our society. It reveals systemic rather than superficial flaws and suggests that radical reconstruction of society itself is the real issue to be faced.

It is time that we stopped our blithe lip service to the guarantees of life, liberty and pursuit of happiness. These fine sentiments are embodied in the Declaration of Independence, but that document was always a declaration of intent rather than of reality. There were slaves when it was written; there were still slaves when it was adopted; and to this day, black Americans have not life, liberty nor the privilege of pursuing happiness, and millions of poor white Americans are in economic bondage that is scarcely less oppressive. Americans who genuinely treasure our national ideals, who know they are still elusive dreams for all too many, should welcome the stirring of Negro demands. They are shattering the complacency that allowed a multitude of social evils to accumulate. Negro agitation is requiring America to re-examine its comforting myths and may yet catalyze the drastic reforms that will save us from social catastrophe.

In indicting white America for its ingrained and tenacious racism, I am using the term "white" to describe the majority, not all who are white. We have found that there are many white people who clearly perceive the justice of the Negro struggle for human dignity. Many of them joined our struggle and displayed heroism no less inspiring than that of black people. More than a few died by our side; their memories are cherished and are undimmed by time.

Yet the largest part of white America is still poisoned by racism, which is as native to our soil as pine trees, sagebrush and buffalo grass. Equally native to us is the concept that gross exploitation of the Negro is acceptable, if not commendable. Many whites who concede that Negroes should have equal access to public facilities and the untrammeled right to vote cannot understand that we do not intend to remain in the basement of the economic structure; they cannot understand why a porter or a housemaid would dare dream of a day when his work will be more useful, more remunerative and a pathway to rising opportunity. This incomprehension is a heavy burden in our efforts to win white allies for the long struggle.

But the American Negro has in his nature the spiritual and worldly fortitude to eventually win his struggle for justice and freedom. It is a moral fortitude that has been forged by centuries of oppression. In their sorrow and their hardship, Negroes have become almost instinctively cohesive. We band together readily; and against white hostility, we have an intense and wholesome loyalty to one another. But we cannot win our struggle for justice all alone, nor do I think that most Negroes want to exclude well-intentioned whites from participation in the black revolution. I believe there is an important place in our struggle for white liberals and I hope that their present estrangement from our movement is only temporary. But many white people in the past joined our movement with a kind of messianic faith that they were going to save the Negro and solve all of his problems very quickly. They tended, in some instances, to be rather aggressive and insensitive to the opinions and abilities of the black people with whom they were working; this has been especially true of students. In many cases, they simply did not know how to work in a supporting, secondary role. I think this problem became most evident when young men and women from elite Northern universities came down to Mississippi to work with the black students at Tougaloo and Rust colleges, who were not quite as articulate, didn't type quite as fast and were not as sophisticated. Inevitably, feeling of white paternalism and black inferiority became exaggerated. The Negroes who rebelled against white liberals were trying to assert their own equality and to cast off the mantle of paternalism.

Fortunately, we haven't had this problem in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Most of the white people who were working with us in 1962 and 1963 are still with us. We have always enjoyed a relationship of mutual respect. But I think a great many white liberals outside S. C. L. C. also have learned this basic lesson in human relations, thanks largely to Jimmy Baldwin and others who have articulated some of the problems of being black in a multiracial society. And I am happy to report that relationships between whites and Negroes in the human rights movement are now on a much healthier basis.

In society at large, abrasion between the races is far more evident—but the hostility was always there. Relations today are different only in the sense that Negroes are expressing the feelings that were so long muted. The constructive achievements of the decade 1955 to 1965 deceived us. Everyone underestimated the amount of violence and rage Negroes were suppressing and the vast amount of bigotry the white majority was disguising. All-black organizations are a reflection of that alienation—but they are only a contemporary way station on the road to freedom. They are a product of this period of identity crisis and directionless confusion. As the human rights movement becomes more confident and aggressive, more nonviolently active, many of these emotional and intellectual problems will be resolved in the heat of battle, and we will not ask what is our neighbor's color but whether he is a brother in the pursuit of racial justice. For much of the fervent idealism of the white liberals has been supplemented recently by a dispassionate recognition of some of the cold realities of the struggle for that justice.

One of the most basic of these realities was pointed out by the President's Riot Commission, which observed that the nature of the American economy in the late 19th and early 20th Centuries made it possible for the European immigrants of that time to escape from poverty. It was an economy that had room for—even a great need for—unskilled manual labor. Jobs were available for willing workers, even those with the educational and language liabilities they had brought with them. But the American economy today is radically different. There are fewer and fewer jobs for the culturally and educationally deprived; thus does present-day poverty feed upon and perpetuate itself. The Negro today cannot escape from his ghetto in the way that Irish, Italian, Jewish and Polish immigrants escaped from their ghettos 50 years ago. New methods of escape must be found. And one of these roads to escape will be a more equitable sharing of political power between Negroes and whites. Integration is meaningless without the sharing of power. When I speak of integration, I don't mean a romantic mixing of colors, I mean a real sharing of power and responsibility. We will eventually achieve this, but it is going to be much more difficult for us than for any other minority. After all, no other minority has been so constantly, brutally and deliberately exploited. But because of this very exploitation, Negroes bring a special spiritual and moral contribution to American life—a contribution without which America could not survive.

The implications of true racial integration are more than just national in scope. I don't believe we can have world peace until America has an "integrated" foreign policy. Our disastrous experiences in Vietnam and the Dominican Republic have been, in one sense, a result of racist decision making. Men of the white West, whether or not they like it, have grown up in a racist culture, and their thinking is colored by that fact. They have been fed on a false mythology and tradition that blinds them to the aspirations and talents of other men. They don't really respect anyone who is not white. But we simply cannot have peace in the world without mutual respect. I honestly feel that a man without racial blinders—or, even better, a man with personal experience of racial discrimination—would be in a much better position to make policy decisions and to conduct negotiations with the underprivileged and emerging nations of the world (or even with Castro, for that matter) than would an Eisenhower or a Dulles.

The American Marines might not even have been needed in Santo Domingo, had the American ambassador there been a man who was sensitive to the color dynamics that pervade the national life of the Dominican Republic. Black men in positions of power in the business world would not be so unconscionable as to trade or traffic with the Union of South Africa, nor would they be so insensitive to the problems and needs of Latin America that they would continue the patterns of American exploitation that now prevail there. When we replace the rabidly segregationist chairman of the Armed Services Committee with a man of good will, when our ambassadors reflect a creative and wholesome interracial background, rather than a cultural heritage that is a conglomeration of Texas and Georgia politics, then we will be able to bring about a qualitative difference in the nature of American foreign policy. This is what we mean when we talk about redeeming the soul of America. Let me make it clear that I don't think white men have a monopoly on sin or greed. But I think there has been a kind of collective experience—a kind of shared misery in the black community—that makes it a little harder for us to exploit other people.

I have come to hope that American Negroes can be a bridge between white civilization and the nonwhite nations of the world, because we have roots in both. Spiritually, Negroes identify understandably with Africa, an identification that is rooted largely in our color; but all of us are a part of the white-American world, too. Our education has been Western and our language, our attitudes—though we sometimes tend to deny it—are very much influenced by Western civilization. Even our emotional life has been disciplined and sometimes stifled and inhibited by an essentially European upbringing. So, although in one sense we are neither, in another sense we are both Americans and Africans. Our very bloodlines are a mixture. I hope and feel that out of the universality of our experience, we can help make peace and harmony in this world more possible.

Although American Negroes could, if they were in decision-making positions, give aid and encouragement to the underprivileged and disenfranchised people in other lands, I don't think it can work the other way around. I don't think the nonwhites in other parts of the world can really be of any concrete help to us, given their own problems of development and self-determination. In fact, American Negroes have greater collective buying power than Canada, greater than all four of the Scandinavian countries combined. American Negroes have greater economic potential than most of the nations—perhaps even more than all of the nations—of Africa. We don't need to look for help from some power outside the boundaries of our country, except in the sense of sympathy and identification. Our challenge, rather, is to organize the power we already have in our midst. The Newark riots, for example, could certainly have been prevented by a more aggressive political involvement on the part of that city's Negroes. There is utterly no reason Addonizio should be the mayor of Newark, with the Negro majority that exists in that city. Gary, Indiana, is another tinderbox city; but its black mayor, Richard Hatcher, has given Negroes a new faith in the effectiveness of the political process.

One of the most basic weapons in the fight for social justice will be the cumulative political power of the Negro. I can foresee the Negro vote becoming consistently the decisive vote in national elections. It is already decisive in states that have large numbers of electoral votes. Even today, the Negroes in New York City strongly influence how New York State will go in national elections, and the Negroes of Chicago have a similar leverage in Illinois. Negroes are even the decisive balance of power in the elections in Georgia, South Carolina and Virginia. So the party and the candidate that get the support of the Negro voter in national elections have a very definite edge, and we intend to use this fact to win advances in the struggle for human rights. I have every confidence that the black vote will ultimately help unseat the diehard opponents of equal rights in Congress—who are, incidentally, reactionary on all issues. But the Negro community cannot win this victory alone; indeed, it would be an empty victory even if the Negroes could win it alone. Intelligent men of good will everywhere must see this as their task and contribute to its support.

The election of Negro mayors, such as Hatcher, in some of the nation's larger cities has also had a tremendous psychological impact upon the Negro. It has shown him that he has the potential to participate in the determination of his own destiny—and that of society. We will see more Negro mayors in major cities in the next ten years, but this is not the ultimate answer. Mayors are relatively impotent figures in the scheme of national politics. Even a white mayor such as John Lindsay of New York simply does not have the money and resources to deal with the problems of his city. The necessary money to deal with urban problems must come from the Federal Government, and this money is ultimately controlled by the Congress of the United States. The success of these enlightened mayors is entirely dependent upon the financial support made available by Washington.

The past record of the Federal Government, however, has not been encouraging. No President has really done very much for the American Negro, though the past two Presidents have received much undeserved credit for helping us. This credit has accrued to Lyndon Johnson and John Kennedy only because it was during their Administrations that Negroes began doing more for themselves. Kennedy didn't voluntarily submit a civil rights bill, nor did Lyndon Johnson. In fact, both told us at one time that such legislation was impossible. President Johnson did respond realistically to the signs of the times and used his skills as a legislator to get bills through Congress that other men might not have gotten through. I must point out, in all honesty, however, that President Johnson has not been nearly so diligent in implementing the bills he has helped shepherd through Congress.

Of the ten titles of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, probably only the one concerning public accommodations—the most bitterly contested section—has been meaningfully enforced and implemented. Most of the other sections have been deliberately ignored. The same is true of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which provides for Federal referees to monitor the registration of voters in counties where Negroes have systematically been denied the right to vote. Yet of the some 900 counties that are eligible for Federal referees, only 58 counties to date have had them. The 842 other counties remain essentially just as they were before the march on Selma. Look at the pattern of Federal referees in Mississippi, for example. They are dispersed in a manner that gives the appearance of change without any real prospect of actually shifting political power or giving Negroes a genuine opportunity to be represented in the government of their state. There is a similar pattern in Alabama, even though that state is currently at odds with the Democratic Administration in Washington because of George Wallace. Georgia, until just recently, had no Federal referees at all, not even in the hard-core black-belt counties. I think it is significant that there are no Federal referees at all in the home districts of the most powerful Southern Senators—particularly Senators Russell, Eastland and Talmadge. The power and moral corruption of these Senators remain unchallenged, despite the weapon for change the legislation promised to be. Reform was thwarted when the legislation was inadequately enforced.

But not all is bad in the South, by any means. Though the fruits of our struggle have sometimes been nothing more than bitter despair, I must admit there have been some hopeful signs, some meaningful successes. One of the most hopeful of these changes is the attitude of the Southern Negro himself. Benign acceptance of second-class citizenship has been displaced by vigorous demands for full citizenship rights and opportunities. In fact, most of our concrete accomplishments have been limited largely to the South. We have put an end to racial segregation in the South; we have brought about the beginnings of reform in the political system; and, as incongruous as it may seem, a Negro is probably safer in most Southern cities than he is in the cities of the North. We have confronted the racist policemen of the South and demanded reforms in the police departments. We have confronted the Southern racist power structure and we have elected Negro and liberal white candidates through much of the South in the past ten years. George Wallace is certainly an exception, and Lester Maddox is a sociological fossil. But despite these anachronisms, at the city and county level, there is a new respect for black votes and black citizenship that just did not exist ten years ago. Though school integration has moved at a depressingly slow rate in the South, it has moved. Of far more significance is the fact that we have learned that the integration of schools does not necessarily solve the inadequacy of schools. White schools are often just about as bad as black schools, and integrated schools sometimes tend to merge the problems of the two without solving either of them.

There is progress in the South, however—progress expressed by the presence of Negroes in the Georgia House of Representatives, in the election of a Negro to the Mississippi House of Representatives, in the election of a black sheriff in Tuskegee, Alabama, and, most especially, in the integration of police forces throughout the Southern states. There are now even Negro deputy sheriffs in such black-belt areas as Dallas County, Alabama. Just three years ago, a Negro could be beaten for going into the county courthouse in Dallas County; now Negroes share in running it. So there are some changes. But the changes are basically in the social and political areas; the problems we now face—providing jobs, better housing and better education for the poor throughout the country—will require money for their solution, a fact that makes those solutions all the more difficult.

The need for solutions, meanwhile, becomes more urgent every day, because these problems are far more serious now than they were just a few years ago. Before 1964, things were getting better economically for the Negro; but after that year, things began to take a turn for the worse. In particular, automation began to cut into our jobs very badly, and this snuffed out the few sparks of hope the black people had begun to nurture. As long as there was some measurable and steady economic progress, Negroes were willing and able to press harder and work harder and hope for something better. But when the door began to close on the few avenues of progress, then hopeless despair began to set in.

The fact that most white people do not comprehend this situation—which prevails in the North as well as in the South—is due largely to the press, which molds the opinions of the white community. Many whites hasten to congratulate themselves on what little progress we Negroes have made. I'm sure that most whites felt that with the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, all race problems were automatically solved. Because most white people are so far removed from the life of the average Negro, there has been little to challenge this assumption. Yet Negroes continue to live with racism every day. It doesn't matter where we are individually in the scheme of things, how near we may be either to the top or to the bottom of society; the cold facts of racism slap each one of us in the face. A friend of mine is a lawyer, one of the most brilliant young men I know. Were he a white lawyer, I have no doubt that he would be in a $100,000 job with a major corporation or heading his own independent firm. As it is, he makes a mere $20,000 a year. This may seem like a lot of money and, to most of us, it is; but the point is that this young man's background and abilities would, if his skin color were different, entitle him to an income many times that amount.

I don't think there is a single major insurance company that hires Negro lawyers. Even within the agencies of the Federal Government, most Negro employees are in the lower echelons; only a handful of Negroes in Federal employment are in upper-income brackets. This is a situation that cuts across this country's economic spectrum. The Chicago Urban League recently conducted a research project in the Kenwood community on the South Side. They discovered that the average educational grade level of Negroes in that community was 10.6 years and the median income was about $4200 a year. In nearby Gage Park, the median educational grade level of the whites was 8.6 years, but the median income was $9600 per year. In fact, the average white high school dropout makes as much as, if not more than, the average Negro college graduate.

Solutions for these problems, urgent as they are, must be constructive and rational. Rioting and violence provide no solutions for economic problems. Much of the justification for rioting has come from the thesis—originally set forth by Franz Fanon—that violence has a certain cleansing effect. Perhaps, in a special psychological sense, he may have had a point. But we have seen a better and more constructive cleansing process in our nonviolent demonstrations. Another theory to justify violent revolution is that rioting enables Negroes to overcome their fear of the white man. But they are just as afraid of the power structure after a riot as before. I remember that was true when our staff went into Rochester, New York, after the riot of 1964. When we discussed the possibility of going down to talk with the police, the people who had been most aggressive in the violence were afraid to talk. They still had a sense of inferiority; and not until they were bolstered by the presence of our staff and given reassurance of their political power and the rightness of their cause and the justness of their grievances were they able and willing to sit down and talk to the police chief and the city manager about the conditions that had produced the riot.

As a matter of fact, I think the aura of paramilitarism among the black militant groups speaks much more of fear than it does of confidence. I know, in my own experience, that I was much more afraid in Montgomery when I had a gun in my house. When I decided that, as a teacher of the philosophy of nonviolence, I couldn't keep a gun, I came face to face with the question of death and I dealt with it. And from that point on, I no longer needed a gun nor have I been afraid. Ultimately, one's sense of manhood must come from within him.

The riots in Negro ghettos have been, in one sense, merely another expression of the growing climate of violence in America. When a culture begins to feel threatened by its own inadequacies, the majority of men tend to prop themselves up by artificial means, rather than dig down deep into their spiritual and cultural wellsprings. America seems to have reached this point. Americans as a whole feel threatened by communism on one hand and, on the other, by the rising tide of aspirations among the undeveloped nations. I think most Americans know in their hearts that their country has been terribly wrong in its dealings with other peoples around the world. When Rome began to disintegrate from within, it turned to a strengthening of the military establishment, rather than to a correction of the corruption within the society. We are doing the same thing in this country and the result will probably be the same—unless, and here I admit to a bit of chauvinism, the black man in America can provide a new soul force for all Americans, a new expression of the American dream that need not be realized at the expense of other men around the world, but a dream of opportunity and life that can be shared with the rest of the world.

It seems glaringly obvious to me that the development of a humanitarian means of dealing with some of the social problems of the world—and the correlative revolution in American values that this will entail—is a much better way of protecting ourselves against the threat of violence than the military means we have chosen. On these grounds, I must indict the Johnson Administration. It has seemed amazingly devoid of statesmanship; and when creative statesmanship wanes, irrational militarism increases. In this sense, President Kennedy was far more of a statesman than President Johnson. He was a man who was big enough to admit when he was wrong—as he did after the Bay of Pigs incident. But Lyndon Johnson seems to be unable to make this kind of statesmanlike gesture in connection with Vietnam. And I think that this has led, as Senator Fulbright has said, to such a strengthening of the military-industrial complex of this country that the President now finds himself almost totally trapped by it. Even at this point, when he can readily summon popular support to end the bombing in Vietnam, he persists. Yet bombs in Vietnam also explode at home; they destroy the hopes and possibilities for a decent America.

In our efforts to dispel this atmosphere of violence in this country, we cannot afford to overlook the root cause of the riots. The President's Riot Commission concluded that most violence-prone Negroes are teenagers or young adults who, almost invariably, are underemployed ("underemployed" means working every day but earning an income below the poverty level) or who are employed in menial jobs. And according to a recent Department of Labor statistical report, 24.8 percent of Negro youth are currently unemployed, a statistic that does not include the drifters who avoid the census takers. Actually, it's my guess that the statistics are very, very conservative in this area. The Bureau of the Census has admitted a ten-percent error in this age group, and the unemployment statistics are based on those who are actually applying for jobs.

But it isn't just a lack of work; it's also a lack of meaningful work. In Cleveland, 58 percent of the young men between the ages of 16 and 25 were estimated to be either unemployed or underemployed. This appalling situation is probably 90 percent of the root cause of the Negro riots. A Negro who has finished high school often watches his white classmates go out into the job market and earn $100 a week, while he, because he is black, is expected to work for $40 a week. Hence, there is a tremendous hostility and resentment that only a difference in race keeps him out of an adequate job. This situation is social dynamite. When you add the lack of recreational facilities and adequate job counseling, and the continuation of an aggressively hostile police environment, you have a truly explosive situation. Any night on any street corner in any Negro ghetto of the country, a nervous policeman can start a riot simply by being impolite or by expressing racial prejudice. And white people are sadly unaware how routinely and frequently this occurs.

It hardly needs to be said that solutions to these critical problems are overwhelmingly urgent. The President's Riot Commission recommended that funds for summer programs aimed at young Negroes should be increased. New York is already spending more on its special summer programs than on its year-round poverty efforts, but these are only tentative and emergency steps toward a truly meaningful and permanent solution. And the negative thinking in this area voiced by many whites does not help the situation. Unfortunately, many white people think that we merely "reward" a rioter by taking positive action to better his situation. What these white people do not realize is that the Negroes who riot have given up on America. When nothing is done to alleviate their plight, this merely confirms the Negroes' conviction that America is a hopelessly decadent society. When something positive is done, however, when constructive action follows a riot, a rioter's despair is allayed and he is forced to re-evaluate America and to consider whether some good might eventually come from our society after all.

But, I repeat, the recent curative steps that have been taken are, at best, inadequate. The summer poverty programs, like most other Government projects, function well in some places and are totally ineffective in others. The difference, in large measure, is one of citizen participation; that is the key to success or failure. In cases such as the Farmers' Marketing Cooperative Association in the black belt of Alabama and the Child Development Group in Mississippi, where the people were really involved in the planning and action of the program, it was one of the best experiences in self-help and grass-roots initiative. But in places like Chicago, where poverty programs are used strictly as a tool of the political machinery and for dispensing party patronage, the very concept of helping the poor is defiled and the poverty program becomes just another form of enslavement. I still wouldn't want to do away with it, though, even in Chicago. We must simply fight at both the local and the national levels to gain as much community control as possible over the poverty program.

But there is no single answer to the plight of the American Negro. Conditions and needs vary greatly in different sections of the country. I think that the place to start, however, is in the area of human relations, and especially in the area of community-police relations. This is a sensitive and touchy problem that has rarely been adequately emphasized. Virtually every riot has begun from some police action. If you try to tell the people in most Negro communities that the police are their friends, they just laugh at you. Obviously, something desperately needs to be done to correct this. I have been particularly impressed by the fact that even in the state of Mississippi, where the FBI did a significant training job with the Mississippi police, the police are much more courteous to Negroes than they are in Chicago or New York. Our police forces simply must develop an attitude of courtesy and respect for the ordinary citizen. If we can just stop policemen from using profanity in their encounters with black people, we will have accomplished a lot. In the larger sense, police must cease being occupation troops in the ghetto and start protecting its residents. Yet very few cities have really faced up to this problem and tried to do something about it. It is the most abrasive element in Negro-white relations, but it is the last to be scientifically and objectively appraised.

When you go beyond a relatively simple though serious problem such as police racism, however, you begin to get into all the complexities of the modern American economy. Urban transit systems in most American cities, for example, have become a genuine civil rights issue—and a valid one—because the layout of rapid-transit systems determines the accessibility of jobs to the black community. If transportation systems in American cities could be laid out so as to provide an opportunity for poor people to get meaningful employment, then they could begin to move into the mainstream of American life. A good example of this problem is my home city of Atlanta, where the rapid-transit system has been laid out for the convenience of the white upper-middle-class suburbanites who commute to their jobs downtown. The system has virtually no consideration for connecting the poor people with their jobs. There is only one possible explanation for this situation, and that is the racist blindness of city planners.

The same problems are to be found in the areas of rent supplement and low-income housing. The relevance of these issues to human relations and human rights cannot be overemphasized. The kind of house a man lives in, along with the quality of his employment, determines, to a large degree, the quality of his family life. I have known too many people in my own parish in Atlanta who, because they were living in overcrowded apartments, were constantly bickering with other members of their families—a situation that produced many kinds of severe dysfunctions in family relations. And yet I have seen these same families achieve harmony when they were able to afford a house allowing for a little personal privacy and freedom of movement.

All these human-relations problems are complex and related, and it's very difficult to assign priorities—especially as long as the Vietnam war continues. The Great Society has become a victim of the war. I think there was a sincere desire in this country four or five years ago to move toward a genuinely great society, and I have little doubt that there would have been a gradual increase in Federal expenditures in this direction, rather than the gradual decline that has occurred, if the war in Vietnam had been avoided.

One of the incongruities of this situation is the fact that such a large number of the soldiers in the Armed Forces in Vietnam—especially the front-line soldiers who are actually doing the fighting—are Negroes. Negroes have always held the hope that if they really demonstrate that they are great soldiers and if they really fight for America and help save American democracy, then when they come back home, America will treat them better. This has not been the case. Negro soldiers returning from World War One were met with race riots, job discrimination and continuation of the bigotry that they had experienced before. After World War Two, the GI Bill did offer some hope for a better life to those who had the educational background to take advantage of it, and there was proportionately less turmoil. But for the Negro GI, military service still represents a means of escape from the oppressive ghettos of the rural South and the urban North. He often sees the Army as an avenue for educational opportunities and job training. He sees in the military uniform a symbol of dignity that has long been denied him by society. The tragedy in this is that military service is probably the only possible escape for most young Negro men. Many of them go into the Army, risking death, in order that they might have a few of the human possibilities of life. They know that life in the city ghetto or life in the rural South almost certainly means jail or death or humiliation. And so, by comparison, military service is really the lesser risk.

One young man on our staff, Hosea Williams, returned from the foxholes of Germany a 60-percent-disabled veteran. After 13 months in a veterans' hospital, he went back to his home town of Attapulgus, Georgia. On his way home, he went into a bus station at Americus, Georgia, to get a drink of water while waiting for his next bus. And while he stood there on his crutches, drinking from the fountain, he was beaten savagely by white hoodlums. This pathetic incident is all too typical of the treatment received by Negroes in this country—not only physical brutality but brutal discrimination when a Negro tries to buy a house, and brutal violence against the Negro's soul when he finds himself denied a job that he knows he is qualified for.

There is also the violence of having to live in a community and pay higher consumer prices for goods or higher rent for equivalent housing than are charged in the white areas of the city. Do you know that a can of beans almost always costs a few cents more in grocery chain stores located in the Negro ghetto than in a store of that same chain located in the upper-middle-class suburbs, where the median income is five times as high? The Negro knows it, because he works in the white man's house as a cook or a gardener. And what do you think this knowledge does to his soul? How do you think it affects his view of the society he lives in? How can you expect anything but disillusionment and bitterness? The question that now faces us is whether we can turn the Negro's disillusionment and bitterness into hope and faith in the essential goodness of the American system. If we don't, our society will crumble.

It is a paradox that those Negroes who have given up on America are doing more to improve it than are its professional patriots. They are stirring the mass of smug, somnolent citizens, who are neither evil nor good, to an awareness of crisis. The confrontation involves not only their morality but their self-interest, and that combination promises to evoke positive action. This is not a nation of venal people. It is a land of individuals who, in the majority, have not cared, who have been heartless about their black neighbors because their ears are blocked and their eyes blinded by the tragic myth that Negroes endure abuse without pain or complaint. Even when protest flared and denied the myth, they were fed new doctrines of inhumanity that argued that Negroes were arrogant, lawless and ungrateful. Habitual white discrimination was transformed into white backlash. But for some, the lies had lost their grip and an internal disquiet grew. Poverty and discrimination were undeniably real; they scarred the nation; they dirtied our honor and diminished our pride. An insistent question defied evasion: Was security for some being purchased at the price of degradation for others? Everything in our traditions said this kind of injustice was the system of the past or of other nations. And yet there it was, abroad in our own land.

Thus was born—particularly in the young generation—a spirit of dissent that ranged from superficial disavowal of the old values to total commitment to wholesale, drastic and immediate social reform. Yet all of it was dissent. Their voice is still a minority; but united with millions of black protesting voices, it has become a sound of distant thunder increasing in volume with the gathering of storm clouds. This dissent is America's hope. It shines in the long tradition of American ideals that began with courageous minutemen in New England, that continued in the Abolitionist movement, that re-emerged in the Populist revolt and, decades later, that burst forth to elect Franklin Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy. Today's dissenters tell the complacent majority that the time has come when further evasion of social responsibility in a turbulent world will court disaster and death. America has not yet changed because so many think it need not change, but this is the illusion of the damned. America must change because 23,000,000 black citizens will no longer live supinely in a wretched past. They have left the valley of despair; they have found strength in struggle; and whether they live or die, they shall never crawl nor retreat again. Joined by white allies, they will shake the prison walls until they fall. America must change.

A voice out of Bethlehem 2000 years ago said that all men are equal. It said right would triumph. Jesus of Nazareth wrote no books; he owned no property to endow him with influence. He had no friends in the courts of the powerful. But he changed the course of mankind with only the poor and the despised. Naïve and unsophisticated though we may be, the poor and despised of the 20th Century will revolutionize this era. In our "arrogance, lawlessness and ingratitude," we will fight for human justice, brotherhood, secure peace and abundance for all. When we have won these—in a spirit of unshakable nonviolence—then, in luminous splendor, the Christian era will truly begin.

Towards Integration as a Goal

by Bayard Rustin

The proposition that separation may be the best solution of America's racial problems has been recurrent in American Negro history. Let us look at the syndrome that has given rise to it.

Separation, in one form or another, has been proposed and widely discussed among American Negroes in three different periods. Each time, it was put forward in response to an identical combination of economic and social factors that induced despair among Negroes. The syndrome consists of three elements: great expectations, followed by dashed hopes, followed by despair and discussion of separation.

The first serious suggestion that Negroes should separate came in the aftermath of the Civil War. During that war many Negroes had not only been strongly in favor of freedom but had fought for the Union. It was a period of tremendous expectations. Great numbers of Negroes left the farms and followed the Union Army as General Sherman marched across Georgia to the sea; they believed that when he got to the sea they would be not only free but also given land—"forty acres and a mule." However, the compromise of 1876 and the withdrawal of the Union Army from the South dashed those expectations. Instead of forty acres and a mule, all they got was a new form of slavery.

Out of the ruins of those hopes emerged Booker T. Washington, saying in essence to Negroes: "There is no hope in your attempting to vote, no hope in attempting to play any part in the political or social processes of the nation. Separate yourself from all that and give your attention to your innards: that you are men, that you maintain dignity, that you drop your buckets where they are, that you become excellent of character."

Of course, it did not work. It could not work. Because human beings have stomachs, as well as minds and hearts, and equate dignity, first of all, not with caste but with class. I preached the dignity of black skin color and wore my hair Afro style long before it became popular; I taught Negro history in the old Benjamin Franklin High School, where I first got my teaching experience, long before it became popular.

But in spite of all that, it is my conviction that there are three fundamental ways in which a group of people can maintain their dignity: one, by gradual advancement in the economic order; two, by being a participating element of the democratic process; and three, through the sense of dignity that emerges from their struggle. For instance, Negroes never had more dignity than when Martin Luther King won the boycott in Montgomery or at the bridge in Selma.

This is not to say that all the values of self-image and identification are not important and should not be stimulated; but they should be given secondary or tertiary emphasis for, unless they rest on a sound economic and social base, they are likely only to create more frustration by raising expectations or hopes with no ability truly to follow through.

The second period of frustration and the call for separation came after World War I. During that war, BAYARD RUSTIN is Executive Director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and a board member of the League for Industrial Democracy. This paper was Rustin's side of a dialogue on separation vs. integration with Prof. Robert Browne of Fairleigh Dickinson University. The discussion was sponsored by the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council and published as a booklet by the Randolph Educational Fund.

300,000 Negro troops went to France—not for the reason Mr. Wilson thought he was sending them, but because they felt that if they fought for their country they would be able to return and say: "We have fought and fought well. Now give us at home what we fought for abroad."

Again, this great expectation collapsed in total despair as a result of postwar developments: Lynchings in the United States reached their height in the early twenties; the Palmer raids did not affect Negroes directly but had such a terrifying effect on civil liberties that no one paid any attention to what was happening to Negroes; Ku Klux Klan moved its headquarters from Georgia to Indianapolis, the heart of the so-called North; and unemployment among Negroes was higher at that period than it had ever been before. It was at that time, too, that Negroes began their great migration to the North, not from choice but because they were being driven off the land in the South by changed economic conditions.

The war having created great expectations, and the conditions following the war having shattered them, a really great movement for separation ensued—a much more significant movement than the current one. Marcus Garvey organized over 2 million Negroes, four times the number the NAACP has ever organized, to pay dues to buy ships to return to Africa.

Today, we are experiencing the familiar syndrome again. The Civil Rights Acts of 1964 and 1965 and the Supreme Court decisions all led people seriously to believe that progress was forthcoming, as they believed the day Martin Luther King said, "I have a dream." What made the March on Washington in 1963 great was the fact that it was the culmination of a period of great hope and anticipation.

But what has happened since? The ghettos are fuller than they have ever been, with 500,000 people moving into them each year and only some 40,000 moving out. They are the same old Bedford-Stuyvesant, Harlem, Detroit and Watts, only they are much bigger, with more rats, more roaches and more despair.

There are more Negro youngsters in segregated schoolrooms than there were in 1954—not all due to segregation or discrimination, perhaps, but a fact. The number of youngsters who have fallen back in their reading, writing and arithmetic since 1954 has increased, not decreased, and unemployment for Negro young women is up to 35, 40 and 50 percent in the ghettos. For young men in the ghettos, it is up to 20 percent and this is a conservative figure. For family men, the unemployment is twice that of whites. Having built up hopes, and suffered the despair which followed, we are again in a period where separation is being discussed.

I maintain that, in all three periods, the turn to separation has been a frustration reaction to objective political, social and economic circumstances. I believe that it is fully justified, for it would be the most egregious wishful thinking to suppose that people can be subjected to deep frustration and yet not act in a frustrated manner.

But however justified and inevitable the frustration, it is totally unrealistic to divert the attention of young Negroes at this time either to the idea of a separate state in the United States, or to going back to Africa, or to setting up a black capitalism (as Mr. Nixon and CORE are now advocating), or to talk about any other possibility of economic separation, when those Negroes who are well off are the 2 million Negroes who are integrated into the trade union movement.

This is not to belittle in any way the desirability of fostering a sense of ethnic unity or racial pride among Negroes or relationships to other black people around the world. This is all to the good, but the ability to do this in a healthy rather than a frustrated way will depend upon the economic viability of the Negro community, the degree to which it can participate in the democratic process here rather than separate from it, and the degree to which it accepts methods of struggle that are productive.

I would not want to leave this subject without observing that, while social and economic conditions have precipitated thoughts of separation, it would be an oversimplification to attribute the present agitation of that idea exclusively to those causes. A good deal of the talk about separation today reflects a class problem within the Negro community .

I submit that it is not the lumpen-proletariat, the Negro working classes, the Negro working poor, who are proclaiming: "We want Negro principals, we want Negro supervisors, we want Negro teachers in our schools." It is the educated Negroes. If you name a leader of that movement, you will put your finger on a man with a Master's or a Ph.D. degree. Being blocked from moving up, he becomes not only interested in Negro children, but in getting those teaching jobs, supervisory jobs and principal jobs for his own economic interest. While this is understandable, it is not true that only teachers who are of the same color can teach pupils effectively. Two teachers had an effect upon me; one was black and the other was white, and it was the white teacher who had the most profound effect, not because she was white but because she was who she was.

Negroes have been taught that we are inferior and many Negroes believe that themselves and have believed it for a long time. That is to say, sociologically we were made children. What is now evident is that the entire black community is rebelling against that concept in behalf of manhood and dignity. This process of rebellion will have as many ugly things in it as beautiful things.

Also, while rebelling there is rejection of those who used to be loved most. Every teenager has to go through hating mother and father, precisely because he loves them. Now he's got to make it on his own. Thus, Martin Luther King and A. Philip Randolph and Roy Wilkins and Bayard Rustin and all the people who marched in the streets are all "finks" now. And the liberals, and the Jews who have done most among the liberals, are also told to get the hell out of the way.

The mythology involved here can be very confusing. Jews may want now to tell their children that they lifted themselves in this society by their bootstraps. And when Negroes have made it, they will preach that ridiculous mythology, too. That kind of foolishness is only good after the fact. It is not a dynamism by which the struggle can take place.

But to return to separation and nationalism. We must distinguish within this movement that which is unsound from that which is sound, for ultimately no propaganda can work for social change which is not based in absolute psychological truth.

There is an aspect of the present thrust toward black nationalism that I call reverse-ism. This is dangerous. Black people now want to argue that their hair is beautiful. All right. It is truthful and useful. But, to the degree that the nationalist movement takes concepts of reaction and turns them upside down and paints them glorious for no other reason than that they are black, we're in trouble—morally and politically. The Ku Klux Klan used to say: "If you're white, you're right; if you're black, no matter who you are, you're no good." And there are those among us who are now saying the opposite of the Ku Klux Klan: "He's a whitey, he's no good."

The Ku Klux Klan said: "You know, we can't have black people teaching" and they put up a big fight when the first Negro was hired in a white school in North Carolina. Now, for all kinds of "glorious" reasons, we're turning that old idea upside down and saying: "Well, somehow or other, there's soul involved and only black teachers can teach black children." But it is not true. Good teachers can teach children.

The Ku Klux Klan said: "We don't want you in our community; get out." Now there are blacks saying: "We don't want any whites in our community for business or anything; get out." The Ku Klux Klan said: "We will be violent as a means of impressing our will on the situation." And now, in conference after conference, a small number of black people use violence and threats to attempt to obstruct the democratic process.

What is essential and what we must not lose sight of is that true self-respect and a true sense of image are the results of a social process and not merely a psychological state of mind.

It is utterly unrealistic to expect the Negro middle class to behave on the basis alone of color. They will behave, first of all, as middle-class people. The minute Jews got enough money to move off Allen Street, they went to West End Avenue. As soon as the Irish could get out of Hell's Kitchen, they beat it to what is now Harlem. Who thinks the Negro middle classes are going to stay in Harlem? I believe that the fundamental mistake of the nationalist movement is that it does not comprehend that class ultimately is a more driving force than color and that any effort to build a society for American Negroes that is based on color alone is doomed to failure.

Now, there are several possibilities. One possibility is that we can stay here and continue the struggle; sometimes things will be better, sometimes they will be worse. Another is to separate ourselves into our own state in America. But I reject that because I do not believe that the American government will ever accept it. Thirdly, there is a possibility of going back to Africa and that is out for me, because I've had enough experience with the Africans to know that they will not accept that.

There is a kind of in-between position—stay here and try to separate and yet not separate. I tend to believe that both have to go on simultaneously. That is to say, there has to be a move on the part of Negroes to develop black institutions and a black image, and all this has to go on while they are going downtown into integrated work situations, while they are trying to get into the suburbs if they can, while they are doing what all other Americans do in their economic and social grasshopping. That is precisely what the Jew has done. He has held on to that which is Jewish, and nobody has made a better effort at integrating out there and making sure that he's out there where the action is. It makes for tensions, but I don't believe there's any other viable reality.

Furthermore, I believe that the most important thing for those of us in the trade union movement, in the religious communities and in the universities is not to be taken in by methods that appeal to people's viscera but do not in fact solve the problems that stimulated their viscera.

We must fight and work for a social and economic program which will lift America's poor, whereby the Negro who is most grievously poor will be lifted to that position where he will be able to have dignity.

Secondly, we must fight vigorously for Negroes to engage in the political process, since there is only one way to have maximum feasible participation—and that is not by silly little committees deciding what they're going to do with a half million dollars, but by getting out into the real world of politics and making their weight felt. The most important thing that we have to do is to restore a sense of dignity to the Negro people.

If that can happen, the intense frustration around the problem of separation will decrease as equal opportunities—economic, political and social—increase. And that is the choice before us.

Teacher unionists are searching for clues to the new Administration's plans for education

NIXON AND THE SCHOOLS

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A New York Times reporter, stationed at the first press conference of Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare-designate Robert H. Finch, observed Dec. 17 that he appeared "as cautious and nervous as an infantry scout picking his way through a mine field."

But the apparent disquietude of the man who will be in charge of President-elect Richard Nixon's educational programs was nothing compared to the apprehension of classroom teachers, union leaders, and educational organizations who have been looking for clues to what the new Administration has in store for the schools.

CONTRADICTIONS

What they've found, thus far, has been deeply contradictory. AFT Director of Legislation Carl Megel, researching Nixon's voting record, found, for example, that in 1960, when a House-passed aid-to-education bill was tied, 44-44, in the Senate, Nixon voted "no" and killed it. In last fall's campaign, the Republican Party called for "state, local, and private" teacher-training programs, pointedly omitting references to federal programs, an ominous sign when one remembers that all 60 educational programs enacted by the federal government during the last years are due to expire in 1970, 1971, or 1972. Finally, Finch has a reputation as a conservative.

However, those clue-searchers who have weighed these facts against more recent statements by Nixon and Finch are showing some guarded optimism. The apparent caution and moderation shown recently by Finch and his boss-to-be give them reason to believe that when the federal education programs come up for renewal, they may not be scuttled, as feared.

Finch, at his December press conference, for example, made none of the expected pledges of scrapping any of the social programs enacted during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, but talked instead of "bringing together the resources of every segment of our society, both governmental and nongovernmental, into a constructive and viable partnership."

"Our job," he also said, "is to rationalize and implement the legislation now on the books."

A possible clue to the new administration's approach may be found in the composition of Nixon's advisors on educational problems.

While Nixon has not yet announced his choice of Commissioner of Education (some pundits think it will be Carl Marburger, commissioner of education for the state of New Jersey), the names of members of a task force he has appointed to investigate short-term educational priorities for the nation have been reported. Alan Pifer, president of the Carnegie Corporation, heads the team, and others include Dr. Clark Kerr, former president of the University of California, and Marburger. Pifer, according to Education Daily (Dec. 6), is known as a "strong advocate of federal aid to education, and his appointment is a possible indication that the federal government's role will not be deemphasized during the Nixon Administration." Concludes ED: "The general makeup of the study group . . . is one that indicates continuing federal support for education. Pifer is also known to favor effective action to improve education in slum areas and this may well be one of the priorities listed by the task force."

POWER-WIELDER

The clue-searchers aren't home free, however, because, in spite of the appearance of liberals on task forces like these, Finch will be the real power-wielder. He is, as the Times described him on Dec. 17, "closer to the President-elect than any other person in public life." Despite his recent "moderate" stances, he is essentially, as the labor news service PAI described him, "conservative but not as right wing as Gov. Reagan."

ROBERT H. FINCH, new Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

The Secretary-designate's press conference was one of his few public appearances since being named to the Cabinet, and he has not spoken much with reporters. A UPI reporter gleaned these views on education from him in an interview published in the Detroit News on Christmas Day:

"The nation's elementary schools must modernize their curriculum to deal with switched-on youngsters who know about things like rockets from watching television and are bored with books about Jack and Jill.

"The end of the Vietnam war will free some money for the urban programs, but I don't think we should be unrealistic and assume that we could just shut it (the war) off like a faucet and then there would be a whole flood of dollars available for domestic problems."

ANTI-COMMUNITY CONTROL

Finch appears to take a strong stand against community control of schools. In the same interview, he said he agreed with the published views of Daniel P. Moynihan, designated as head of Nixon's Cabinet-level urban council, that some antipoverty programs failed because they placed too much stress on "community participation."

He said the government should "talk to and communicate with people to find out what their aspirations and motivations are." But he said it was not a "valid concept" to turn administration over to inexperienced community residents. He said, "I find that many of these so-called militants have a very narrow constituency. I hope that our programs can be geared to the responsible members of all these minority communities."

AFT Legislative Director Carl Megel points out that on the surface it would appear that, because the new Congress will remain under Democratic control, education legislation would continue to receive favorable priorities.

Such a conclusion, he says, fails to recognize:

(a.) the tremendous power of a new President; and

Megel says:

"A list of positions to be filled by the new President is illuminating. Not only does the President appoint his own Cabinet, but, in addition, he makes 390 appointments to high positions in the executive branch, including heads of major bureaus and members of commissions; 400 positions on the White House staff; 470 officials with non-career, executive assignments; 112 ambassadors; 17 vacant federal judgeships; 93 U.S. attorneys; all officials of the District of Columbia, including the mayor and city council members; the heads of the FBI and the CIA; all vacant and future vacancies for postmaster positions, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and all future vacancies on the Court."

In the U.S. Office of Education, alone, Nixon will make 250 to 300 appointments to high positions.

Meany views the new Administration

WASHINGTON, D.C. (PAI)

AFL-CIO President George Meany said the AFL-CIO "hopes to cooperate with the Nixon Administration and there is some indication that they want to cooperate with us."

His remarks were made during a press conference reporting on the meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council here.

When asked about how the labor movement would get along with the new Administration, Meany said, "We'll do all right. The American trade-union movement is in pretty good shape. We'll continue our collective bargaining. We'll work for legislation on the 'Hill.'"

Meany indicated no dissatisfaction with the appointment of George P. Shultz as Secretary of Labor. In response to a question, Meany declared that he did not think Shultz "would look upon with favor" the scuttling of the National Labor Relations Board sought by conservative business groups.

A reporter wanted to know whether Meany had anything to do with the Shultz appointment.

"I think I did in one way," he answered. "I told Nixon I would prefer a businessman to a man from the academic world. And that did it." Shultz is dean of the Graduate School of Business at the University of Chicago.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

THE CURRENT STATE OF TEACHER PAY

'. . . when we consider inflation and higher taxes, the beginning teacher is no better off today than the beginner a year ago.'

Salaries, fringe benefits, and other economic benefits paid teachers add up to an income that is lower, on the average, than the U.S. Dept. of Labor's recommended income for a "moderate but adequate" standard of living for a typical family of four.

That's one of the major conclusions of this year's Survey of Teacher Salaries, just published by the American Federation of Teachers' Research Department.

A summary of the new survey—which includes school districts with 6,000 or more students—follows.

You can get a copy of the complete survey (35 cents to AFT members; $1.50 to others) by writing to the AFT Order Dept., 1012 14th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005, and asking for Publication No. 84.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A beginning teacher, fresh from college with his bachelor's degree, can go to work in some parts of the contiguous U.S. for a starting annual salary as high as $7,500. (In Fairbanks, Alaska, the starting salary is $8,150.)

But if his mobility is limited and his freedom of choice curtailed, he may end up working for a starting pay of only $4,400—just about $20 a week above the U.S. government's "poverty line" figures and more than $5,500 below what the U.S. government considers "moderate, but adequate" for a family of four.

This startling disparity in teachers' pay is one of the facts brought out in the 1968-69 survey of teachers' salaries, published this month by the American Federation of Teachers' research department. In preparation for the last few months, the survey analyzes teachers' salaries in more than 750 school districts—those with 6,000 or more students enrolled—throughout the U.S.

The low salaries (the $4,400 figure comes from Louisiana) are generally found in the Southeastern and Southwestern states, and scattered rural areas. Teachers in many such districts often reach the end of the line—a magnificent $5,292 in Anniston, Ala.—after 10 years of dedicated service.

The high salaries (the $7,500 figure is from Detroit) tend to come from urban areas—chiefly those where the AFT bargains for the teaching force. One of the survey's conclusions is that AFT-organized cities tend to pay substantially higher salaries than those in which the NEA is the recognized bargaining agent.

NATIONWIDE AVERAGES

Today's starting salary for a classroom teacher (with a bachelor's degree) averages roughly $5,870. The range of starting salaries goes from a low of $4,400 to a high of $7,500. In the school year 1967-68, the average beginning salary was approximately $5,525.

This year's increase, then, represents a 6.2-percent rise. This was 1 percent below the unusually high increase of 1967-68. Also, when we consider inflation and higher taxes, the beginning teacher is no better off today than the beginner a year ago.

Looking back over the decade, if we compare these percentage increases with the average annual increases of 3.0-3.5 percent over the five-year period of 1961-65, they may appear impressive. However, the differences are found in the absence of perceptible inflation (and even a tax reduction in 1964) during this latter period, as compared to rapid inflation and tax hikes (at all levels of government, particularly state and local) since January, 1966. These factors explain why college graduates going into teaching this year are, on the average, no better off than the beginning teacher of 1965.

The question may be raised whether the picture is much brighter for teachers in the larger school systems with 25,000 or more enrollment, and whether the low averages have been pulled down by the small school systems. If we look at the large school systems (25,000 or more) we find the average is still only about $6,025. Of course, most of the school systems paying their beginning teaching staffs below $6,000 are located in the Southeastern and Southwestern states.

AFT bargaining tops NEA again

The brighter revelations of the new AFT salary survey are reflected in the very distinct salary gains in areas where AFT locals are the collective-bargaining agents. In particular, the accompanying table shows that AFT locals have negotiated salary increases far ahead of the NEA affiliates.

A comparison of the seven largest AFT and NEA cities places the AFT ahead in every salary lane by $488 to $951. However, even this large gap is not the whole story. The comparison further reveals that it is approximately $487 cheaper to live and raise a family in the AFT cities than the NEA cities. This means that the average starting salary for a teacher with a bachelor's degree is worth (in purchasing power) more than $980, compared with the NEA average. In fact, a teacher with a master's degree plus 30 semester hours and 12 years experience would be making a salary worth more than $1,430, compared to the NEA teacher.

Another table, included in the survey, lists over 20 school districts in which the AFT has negotiated, with few exceptions, salary increases of 9 to 10 percent.

The main conclusions from the new analysis of teachers' salaries are: (1) In general, teachers have made unimpressive gains toward achieving goals of "Nationwide Educational Excellence." The intolerable gap between the financial reward for teaching in our public schools and other professions in business and industry has generally widened. Why should the teachers, with their low salaries, and the majority of the community, through regressive taxes,* continue to subsidize the large firms which profit from our school systems' "product"—skilled workers?; (2) Specifically, in selected school districts, mainly where there is a strong AFT bargaining unit, teachers have begun to close the gap. In more than 20 AFT cities, salaries have been pushed up at the annual rate of 9-10 percent and in some cities the increase has been as high as 11.2 percent (Chicago) and 19.2 percent (Washington, D.C.). Furthermore, salaries are only half the story. Economic fringe benefits—including school-board-paid life and health insurance—are being written into contracts by AFT affiliates throughout the country.

Achieving nationwide educational excellence is definitely going to be an uphill battle on many fronts. This crucial fight will have to be waged through unrelenting political pressure by the labor movement at all levels of government, and community organizing (PTA, etc.) around the issues of tax reform (the institution of progressive taxes), and strike action where it becomes necessary.

COMPARISONS OF STARTING SALARIES OF TEACHERS WITH OTHER OCCUPATIONS

How do teaching salaries compare to other professional occupations? The answer is that they continue to compare miserably.

First, if we look at family income and level of education, it is common knowledge that they are positively correlated, i.e., family income increases as the number of years of school completed increases. The median family income for those heads of families with four years or more of college was $11,697 as of March, 1967. The average salary paid the classroom teacher was $6,830 for the 1966-67 school year. This was $4,867 less than the median income of those heads of families who attained comparable levels of education.

In short, the college graduate is attracted to the higher salaries paid professional and clerical workers in the private sector, and not into the nation's most valuable growth-producing industry—education.

For example, the starting salaries that were offered in November, 1967, to men who graduate in June, 1968, (survey of 200 well-known business and industrial concerns), ranged from a high of $9,168 for engineers, or 36 percent higher than the beginning teacher, to a low of $7,332 for liberal arts majors, or 20 percent higher than the classroom teacher. The only category to fall below the average starting salary for teaching was secretarial work for women college graduates with a bachelor's degree. This category was lower by approximately 2 percent, or about $110.

Comparisons with production or nonsupervisory workers in mining and contract construction (whose average salaries are $7,500 and $8,950 respectively, if they are employed the full year), also reveal significant disparities outside the professional categories.

MEASURED AGAINST KEYSERLING YARDSTICK

If this year's gain is continued through 1977, then Leon H. Keyserling's salary goals for teachers ("A 10-Year Plan to Save the Schools," Changing Education, Summer-Fall, 1968) will not be achieved.

Keyserling projected that the average annual salary of the classroom teacher should reach $10,711 by 1977, or 57 percent above the nationwide average of $6,830 for 1967. Also, he added: "It should be stated most emphatically that the foregoing figures are designed only to indicate the minimum amount of progress that must be made in each region and state to bring them all to the level of educational services below which, in the view of this study, no region or state should fall." Thus, Keyserling is urging a necessary floor, but any region whose wealth and income permits can continue to lift its standards still higher.

The regional disparities continue to persist, with average differences as high as $750-800 for the starting salary (bachelor's degree) and $2,500-3,000 for teachers with a master's degree (maximum).

If we compare the latest average increase in starting salaries for teachers with pay prospects in other professions, the post-World War II lag will definitely continue. Increases in other professional categories were 7-8 percent for 1968, and preliminary estimates for 1969 graduates average 8-9 percent.

MEASURED AGAINST U.S. GOVERNMENT'S COST-OF-LIVING STATISTICS

Keyserling is careful to stress "one word of warning" when setting goals for teachers' salaries. He notes that his projected goals "are set forth in 1967 dollars to indicate the needed rates of real income progress." Thus, if present trends of rising prices continue, his figure of $8,139 as an average minimum salary would have to be raised to $9,000 in 1970 and to $14,700 in 1977.

This brings us to a comparison of the teacher's income with the U.S. Labor Department's "City Worker's Family Budget." The incorporation of this concept into our latest salary survey provides a measure of the adequacy of teachers' salaries. The budget reflects the annual cost of living for a metropolitan family of four, consisting of an employed man (34-54 years of age) and his wife (who is not employed outside the home), a boy, age 13, and a girl of 8.

After adjusting for increases in consumer prices, social security taxes, federal income taxes (surtax), and the standard of the budget, the "moderate budget" will be $11,478 (metropolitan) and $10,212 (nonmetropolitan) for the year ending September, 1969. The average teacher's pay for the school year 1968-69 is at least 45 to 50 percent below this "moderate" budget. For a family of three, the deficit is 30 to 40 percent. —J.O.

LIVING STANDARDS FALL

Teachers, all worse off

By JOHN OLIVER
Assistant Director of Research, AFT

For the last few years, we have listened to government officials and economic analysts tell of our "entering into the 89th consecutive month of sustained prosperity," or "the American citizen is better off today than at any other time" and "personal income has risen at unprecedented rates." More recently, Business Week's Nov. 16 "Measure of Personal Income" shows that "wallets were nearly $5-billion fatter last August than they were in the same month the year before."

From big-business spokesmen, we continue to hear the charge that inflation in consumer prices is the result of trade unions' "excessive" wage demands, or "wage-push" inflation, as economists say.

Also, headlines earlier in the year carried these typical themes: "The Coming Rash of Teachers Strikes" and, "There is a master plan behind a wave of teachers' strikes about to sweep the country" (U.S. News & World Report, Sept. 2, 1968). Many of these predicted strikes did occur. The reason thousands of teachers refused to work in the first few months of the school year was because, as Look editor Jack Star said, "The teachers are angry and getting angrier by the minute" (Sept. 3, 1968).

The anger of teachers stems from a multiplicity of factors that have accumulated over the last few decades. Primarily, these factors include lagging financial reward, large classes, dilapidated facilities, and obdurate administrations. While most of the mass media carried stories that declared the public was getting "fed up" with public employees striking, particularly teachers, a recent Harris poll showed that 59 percent of the public considers strikes by teachers "justifiable."

Also, in the last few years the continued declarations of "unprecedented prosperity" and the "striking teacher" image have left the impression that teachers have gotten a big share of the "increase" in the total "pie."

Let us consider some recent studies which expose these claims and charges as myth and/or distortion.

First, since December, 1965, the "purchasing power" of the average worker's take-home pay has declined almost every consecutive month.

The gross average weekly earnings of production or nonsupervisory workers, who represent 83 percent of nonagricultural and nongovernmental workers and 61 percent of all employment, was $101.99, or $2.67 per hour. This provides an annual income (assuming the worker does not experience the hardship of unemployment during the year) of $5,304. Since more married women are second "breadwinners" than ever before, this tends to boost average family income. In fact, last year 35 percent of all married women were employed, and in homes with earnings of $10,000, 45 percent of the wives are working (Wall Street Journal, Nov. 3, 1968, p. 1). Today, approximately 28 percent of the nation's 48.5 million families earn $10,000 or more annually.

Because $10,000 may seem to be a very high income, and it is considerably above the incomes of more than 70 percent of American families, we need only look at the United States Department of Labor's "Annual Costs of the City Worker's Family Budget" to see that, today, even this kind of income does not go far enough. In mid-1966, the department's "moderate" standard-of-living budget for a family of four averaged $9,376 in metropolitan areas and $8,506 in smaller cities.

But, after adjusting for increases in consumer prices, social security taxes, federal income taxes (surtax), and "real" national product for the three-year period ending mid-1969, the cost of the "moderate" budget will have increased to $11,478 and $10,212, respectively. Presently, more than 75 percent of American families live below this "moderate" budget.

Teachers, other workers suffer while profits rise

What about the average classroom teacher's standard of living? The answer was capsulized in a recent U.S. Labor Department release: "In real terms, from 1939 to 1967, the average mean salary of public school teachers in our 10 largest cities increased only 39.4 percent . . . compared with 56.8 percent for federal classified employees . . . 101.1 percent for manufacturing production workers . . . and 114.2 percent for U.S. per-capita income."

Over half of the men teachers moonlight (work after school on another job) to make ends meet. Even with this extra income, they cannot earn enough to close the 40-to-50-percent gap between other professions (with comparable years of higher education) and the U.S. government's measure of a "City Worker's Family Budget." (See summary article of conclusions from our latest salary survey, p. 8.)

If the average American family has been undergoing a pocketbook pinch during these times of "unprecedented prosperity," the obvious question is, whose prosperity? This question was answered by Nathaniel Goldfinger, organized labor's top economist, when he charged that the situation today "clearly pictures a lack of balance 'in the economy,' with 'skyrocketing profits'—up 84 percent since 1960—and 'soaring dividends'—up 73 percent since 1960—while workers' earnings rose only 27 percent and buying power only 10 percent." This decade has produced at least one distinct characteristic aside from the $100-billion-plus Vietnam war and the accompanying increase in internal dissent and protest—the decade of "surging profits."

PROFIT-PUSH INFLATION

In a recent Wall Street Journal article (Aug. 5), Alfred L. Malabre Jr. suggested that the available evidence shows that "any attempt to fix the blame for today's inflation shouldn't be limited simply to a consideration of labor costs . . . a major culprit may be corporate profits." To substantiate this claim, an examination of postwar price movements reveals three distinct periods in which factory prices climbed significantly over a prolonged interval, with the following relationships:

"In each instance, labor costs per unit of factory output were declining when the price climb began, and these costs continued to decline for a considerable period after the price rise was underway.

"In each case, corporate profits began to increase sharply well before the price climb started.

"Such facts, at least to some economists, bear an obvious message. 'The pattern is clear enough,' says Peter L. Bernstein, president of Bernstein-Macaulay, Inc., a New York investment counseling service. 'Instead of labor costs pushing prices up, what we see instead is a sort of profit-push. Profits are already well on their way up before prices begin to rise, and prices are well on their way up before wages begin to rise faster than output.'

"Indeed, some analysts say that the postwar economic record suggests a chain of events that runs something like this: Profits begin to climb, first through the impact of better machinery and work methods on unit labor costs, and then through higher prices; the rising profits finally prompt labor to attempt to 'catch up' by seeking sharply higher pay; ultimately, unit labor costs begin to rise, too, giving inflation a further push."

In short, key factors in the "pocketbook pinch," along with the war-tax, are profiteering, in terms of price increases; sharp increases in dividend payments to stockholders (about two-tenths of one percent of stockholding families own about 70 percent of publicly held industrial stock); and sharp increases in the compensation of executives.

How can the giant companies do this? The near monopoly position of most of the major companies in key industries (where price increases have repercussions throughout the economy) provides them with enough pricing power to offset any wage increase they are forced to give their employees. But, in most instances, they go even further and use the wage increase to justify a much greater price hike, i.e. charge as much as the traffic will bear.

The increasing monopoly power of a few giant corporations which dominate key industries has become a permanent feature of the postwar U.S. economy. However, the 1960s have produced the greatest number and the biggest corporate consolidations in mining, manufacturing, and banking than any past period in our history (Business Week, May 25, 1968).

A recent study shows that, during 1967 alone, 23 huge (assets of $100-million-plus) mergers took place, as many as in the entire 1952-through-1962 period. One-third of the $100-million-plus acquisitions for the last 20 years took place in 1967, and 12 of these mergers involved companies worth more than $250 million (Business Week, May 25, 1968). Only about 370 industrial corporations have assets above $100 million (The Fortune Directory, June 15, 1967). It is estimated the total number of corporate mergers this year (1968) will be 3,400, compared to 2,975 (1967), 2,377 (1966), and 2,215 (1965) (U.S. News & World Report, July 29, 1968).

SUMMARY

The net result of increasing concentration and control of corporate wealth has been profit inflation, paralleled with the decline of the average wage earner's "real" income for the past three years. In addition to their policy of offsetting the workers' wage increases by raising prices, the corporations have shifted most of the recent surtax to their customers.

A Wall Street Journal columnist wrote: "Regardless of how emphatically you say no, it's quite possible that individuals will help shoulder the extra tax load imposed on some of the country's mightiest corporations" (July 29, 1968, p. 1).

The rapid boost in prices in the last few months, particularly in October, reflects the shift of the burden to the workers. Commenting on price increases for October, Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of labor statistics, noted that the outstanding feature of the 0.6 percent jump in retail prices last month was its "pervasiveness." In other words, the increase didn't appear to be a one-month aberration in a few selected services (medical care, etc.) (Washington Post, Nov. 28, 1968). Instead, the whole spectrum of over 400 goods and services showed marked price increases.

With Miss Carey above are AFT President David Selden, left, who spoke about AFT-NEA merger at the banquet, and Gregory W. Coughlin, Local 930 president. Miss Carey, a school librarian who led the local on strike several times, was presented with a television set and a copy of the Carey family coat of arms.

CORTLAND, N.Y.

The executive committee of AFT Local 1655 at Cortland State University College here has voted complete support of striking steelworkers at the Wickwire plant, deploring management threats to hire replacements for the 240 striking members of the steelworkers' union, and urging Wickwire to bargain in good faith with its employees. Dr. Donald E. Leon, president of Local 1655, released the union's statement to the press.

termine whether or not he is reelected. Early returns reported his defeat, and, on Dec. 30, Morse conceded that Robert Packwood, his Republican opponent, had, indeed, won. Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Texas) will succeed him in the Labor and Education Subcommittee chairmanship.

During the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations, 60 pieces of educational legislation were enacted and signed by the President. Every community and every school district in the nation has been aided in some phase by these federal education innovations.

Included in the legislation are the following:

A. Elementary and Secondary Education Act provides for:

1. financial assistance for education of children of low-income families;
2. school library resources;
3. educational centers and services;
4. grants to strengthen state departments of education; and
5. education of the handicapped, etc.

B. Other major education laws cover: vocational education amendments; adult education; school construction; extension of the National Defense Education Act; bilingual education; etc.

C. The Higher Education Act provides for:

1. continuing education programs;
2. student assistance, student loans, graduate fellowships;
3. undergraduate instructional equipment;
4. Networks for Knowledge;
5. improvement of graduate programs;
6. guidance, counseling, and testing; and
7. language training.

All of these programs will expire by the end of fiscal 1972. Many expire in fiscal 1970 and others in 1971. Just to keep these programs going with complete funding will constitute a major project.

TAX CREDITS

During the campaign and since the election, President-elect Nixon has indicated his support for tax credits to industrial institutions which set up training programs and employment centers, especially in disadvantaged areas. The AFT is on record as opposing tax credits in any form. The report of the National Commission on Urban Problems, which was chaired by former Senator Paul Douglas of Illinois, states its emphatic opposition to tax credits and points out that their effect on eradicating poverty in the disadvantaged areas will be negligible.

TAX REFORM

The AFT will support the position of the AFL-CIO on tax reform, particularly on oil depletion allowances and other income tax inequities. A resolution by the 1968 AFT convention supports this position.

HUMAN RIGHTS CONVENTIONS

The AFT is on record in support of ratification of the nine human rights conventions, of which the U.S. has ratified only the convention on slavery. The AFT 1968 convention also supported this position with a resolution.

The nine conventions cover genocide, freedom of association, slavery, political rights of women, forced labor, employment discrimination, equal remuneration, discrimination in education, and racial discrimination.

Of the 109 nations represented at the United Nations, only the Philippines has approved all nine conventions. The Soviet Union has approved all except the ones on forced labor and racial discrimination.

IMPROVEMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY

President-elect Nixon campaigned for improvements in social security, including raising amounts an annuitant can earn. Vice President Humphrey campaigned on a program to provide federal contributions to increase social security benefits. The AFT will support a 50-percent increase in social security benefits.

We also will give consideration to another important factor. Only individuals covered by social security as of July 1, 1968, are eligible for Medicare. At this time, 13 states enrolling more than 700,000 teachers are not under social security, and, therefore, are not eligible for Medicare.

The above items, upon recommendation of the legislative committee, were approved for action by the AFT executive council. We will be expanding and amending the proposals and objectives as the direction of the new Administration begins to evolve.

We will need your help more definitely than ever before. As an aid, we have published a new booklet, entitled The Teacher's Guide to Legislative Action, which not only provides suggestions but also gives information vital to teachers who are working on legislative matters. The booklet is also valuable to teachers of civics, government, or American history, since it provides a complete outline of "How a Bill Becomes a Law." Copies are available through the national office at 25¢ each. Please ask for item L-1. The booklet also contains reproductions of all collective-bargaining laws which pertain to public employees, including teachers, now on the statute books in the various states.

We must all work together to insure the continuation of education as our major legislative priority.

Chicago teacher strike forecast

Unless the legislature comes to the rescue, says Supt. James Redmond, the belt-tightening program in the city will include such drastic steps backward as: layoff of 6,000 teachers; cutbacks in the number of teacher aides and in civil service personnel; loss of vacation pay and personal business days for teachers; a sharp slicing of the recreation fund for the schools; curtailed employment of substitutes; and no expansion of the program to remove socially maladjusted children from regular classrooms.

Among the most serious areas to be affected should no additional money be forthcoming would be class size, which would jump from 35 to 45, and the inner-city schools, which would receive no additional assistance.

The current Chicago union-board contract, the second negotiated since the city teachers voted overwhelmingly for Local 1 as their bargaining agent, expired Dec. 31.

AN HEW DECISION THAT MAY HURT SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

In what must be counted as an inauspicious beginning, the Nixon Administration has taken an action that could adversely affect Federal efforts to carry out the mandate of Congress and the courts to desegregate the nation's schools.

In his first ruling since taking office, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Robert H. Finch, let a scheduled cut-off of Federal funds to five Southern school districts go into effect, but amended the order so that the districts still have 60 days in which to try and get the money back.

This equivocal ruling may encourage those in the South who have been fighting HEW's desegregation guidelines and seek to perpetuate segregation. Senator Strom Thurmond (R., S. C.) said he was "encouraged" by the Secretary's action, reviving the fears stirred by President Nixon's campaign statement that he thought HEW was "going too far" when it withheld funds from school districts that fail or refuse to desegregate.

HEW Must Cut Off Funds

Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, HEW has no choice. It must cut off funds from districts that do not comply with the law. The five districts in North and South Carolina and Mississippi have all had long histories of resistance. HEW has investigated, negotiated and conferred with them for more than a year. Not till it failed to get compliance did it order the cut-off.

When Finch Hesitates, the South Hopes

To Mr. Finch's credit he did let the cut-off go through. In an accompanying statement he said, "When all of the alternatives have been exhausted as they have been in these instances, the law must be enforced." But then he went on to offer the five districts still another alternative.

The funds they were denied are being put in trust with state school officials for 60 days. Negotiating teams are being sent down to help the districts develop workable plans. If they succeed, the districts will get their money in the end.

It is this element of retroactivity that is new. It may well be the most dangerous aspect of Mr. Finch's ruling. Till now, when a district lost its money that was that. It could not get it back again. It could try and come into compliance with the law and seek new Federal funds for the next school year. But the cut-off funds were lost.

Mr. Finch denies he is setting a precedent. But when he treats stubborn districts with a new leniency, others who want to resist the law are sure to have their hopes raised. If those five why not others?

"A Costly...Retreat"

That the South is already reading Mr. Finch's decision in this way is evident from the approval he evoked from Thurmond and from the dismay he aroused among those in the region who want to see the law obeyed.

In an editorial entitled "A Costly Nixon Retreat" the Atlanta Journal for January 30, said of Mr. Finch, "He strengthens the forces of defiance, threatens the political futures of those who have tried to do the right thing and offers subtle promise that the law really is not the law."

The Threat of New Violations

In a statement issued for the Leadership Conference, Roy Wilkins, Chairman, warned that the decision "is bound to stimulate new violations of a law overwhelmingly passed by Congress." We enclose that statement with this MEMO.

We urge our organizations to consider this matter carefully. Secretary Finch can be commended for withholding funds, but he needs to be warned against giving any sign of weakness and urged to refuse funds to districts not in full compliance with Title VI.

In his wish to be fair, there is a danger that Mr. Finch may substitute "a continuing dialogue between all parties" for strict enforcement of the law. The parents and students of the South who have been denied their rights for years are sick of dialogue. They want the government to act.

A CLOTURE DEFEAT THAT RAISES HOPES OF VICTORY

Although the Senate last week failed in its second attempt to make it easier to end a filibuster, it did so under circumstances that hold forth the hope it may succeed next time.

On Tuesday, January 28, a Senate majority voted 50 to 42 to stop debate and let the body take up a resolution that would have changed Rule XXII so that three-fifths instead of two-thirds of those present and voting would be needed to end a filibuster. But that was 12 votes short of the two-thirds needed under the rule the Senators were trying to change.

Still it was a stronger showing than those who want to change Rule XXII were able to make at the start of the last Congress. On January 16, 45 Senators voted to sustain former Vice President Humphrey's ruling that at the start of a new session a majority can change the rules (see MEMO No. 2-69). That was 5 short of the votes needed. In 1967, at the start of the 90th Congress, only 37 Senators were ready to sustain a rules change by a majority. There would appear to be an increase of 8 in favor of change.

The Senate grows younger. Eight of the 15 newcomers, including 5 Republicans, voted for cloture. Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, who supported the three-fifths change, may yet prove prophetic when he declared during the debate preceding last Tuesday's vote, "The winds of change are blowing. We will face up to this fact, recognize it or be blown away by it."

THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE CELEBRATES ITS 20TH ANNIVERSARY

On January 28th, the day the Senate voted on cloture, the Leadership Conference held its annual board meeting and in the evening, celebrated its 20th Anniversary. It did so by honoring two champions: Hubert H. Humphrey for his long struggle in support of civil rights and the Conference chairman, Roy Wilkins.

About 1200 persons were on hand for the occasion and heard Bayard Rustin, Whitney Young, Walter Reuther, Andrew Biemiller, Miss Dorothy Height and Clarence Mitchell, as well as the guest of honor, reaffirm the continuing efforts of the coalition of labor, civil rights and religious forces that have worked so untiringly together for new laws and for strong enforcement. Of the Leadership Conference, Mr. Humphrey said, "this is a strong and militant group. We need to keep that militancy for good purpose." The goal of full equality in a plural integrated society never seemed closer than it did that night.

STATEMENT BY ROY WILKINS, CHAIRMAN, LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS ON THE ANNOUNCED HOLD-UP OF FUNDS TO FIVE SCHOOL DISTRICTS - JANUARY 31, 1969

The administration's decision, Wednesday, to virtually set up a trust fund for five Southern school districts that have refused to desegregate their schools is bound to stimulate new violations of a law overwhelmingly passed by Congress.

HEW has investigated and conferred with these districts for more than a year. When it was plain that they had no intention of desegregating their schools, HEW, as it must under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, notified them it was cutting off all Federal funds. Under normal and lawful procedure that should have been the end of it. The obligation is then upon the districts to show their good faith by developing a genuine plan of desegregation and soliciting reinstatement by HEW.

Instead, the administration is ready to coddle them. An administration that has promised us an era of law and order and has avowed its intention to be hard on criminals, is ready, now, to deal leniently with school officials who have criminally denied constitutional rights to their students.

Instead of cutting off funds, HEW is going to let state school officials hold them in trust for 60 days while it give still another chance to violators who have had abundant opportunity to comply with the law.

Secretary Finch's decision to send negotiation teams into these districts "to fairly and fully establish the facts" is wasteful and unnecessary. The facts in these cases are already fully established. HEW would not dare advocate a termination of funds unless this were so. What more can new investigators find? What more, under the law, does HEW have to know" How can we be sure these negotiators will not use easier standards than those already established in order to reach an accommodation with recalcitrant districts? During the presidential campaign, Senator Strom Thurmond advised Southern school districts to drag their feet, to disregard the law. The suspicion arises that he is now being paid off.

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights has had long experience with civil rights enforcement. It has been our experience that where the government administers the law fairly and firmly, people comply. Where it yields and deals and tries to coax them into compliance, they don't.

Mr. Finch says no precedent will be set by this action. We hope he is correct. We fear, however, that his act will encourage disregard for the school desegregation laws, embitter students and parents who have seen those laws bring little in the way of improved or integrated education and strengthen Southern school officials in their resolve to keep segregation.

It is a terrible decision and a miserable way to start four years of working for the health, education and welfare of American citizens.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1969

The Business of Business Is Still Business

By JOHN A. HAMILTON

The hard-core unemployed, those down-and-out minority group members without motivation, job skills or steady work records, very largely remain the hard-core unemployed.

The National Alliance of Businessmen which has reported putting more than 100,000 hard-core unemployed on business payrolls within the past year may disagree with this, but it was the conclusion of business leaders and economists attending a recent Harvard conference on "Programs to Employ the Disadvantaged." Their conclusion has profound implications for the Nixon Administration.

President Nixon stressed "volunteerism" during his election campaign and emphasized the limits of governmental power and the larger role private enterprise must play in easing urban tensions and bringing Americans together.

"Private enterprise, far more effectively than the Government, can provide the jobs, train the unemployed . . . offer the new opportunities which will produce progress," he said.

Those at the conference in Cambridge, officials of companies especially active in recruiting slum-area workers, described the efforts they have been making—and some of these efforts have been extensive, long-term and costly. They stressed the reverse of Mr. Nixon's campaign appeal. They outlined the limits of what private enterprise can be expected to do and in the process underscored the need for expanded governmental programs to meet some of the basic problems.

"What used to be called the high-school dropout is now called the hard-core," one said. "We've been hiring the hard-core for years."

Those involved in the slums identify not one but two hard-cores, the hard-core worker with motivation who is being hired and the hard-core worker without motivation who is not. There is a need for governmental programs that reach into the slums early in a disadvantaged child's life to reduce the number without motivation later on.

Business involvement in the slums, like the slums themselves, has developed a special argot. In hiring the one hard-core and rejecting the other, firms such as the automobile companies in Detroit and I.B.M. in the Bedford-Stuyvestant section of Brooklyn have been "creaming," taking only the best.

No New Jobs

In Detroit, where nearly 40,000 of the hard-core have been hired according to the National Alliance's statistics, the automobile industry has revised its hiring standards and recruited directly in the slums. But the revision in standards is slight, and those being hired today as hard-core are not much different from those hired in the past. Training programs have remained much the same. No new jobs have been created. The hard-core have been hired to do the jobs that need doing.

In Bedford-Stuyvesant, the new I.B.M. plant which began operations in July hired about 150 of its first 2,500 job applicants. A statistical study reveals that most of those hired were men who already had jobs. Some 78 per cent were employed, and their average base pay in their old jobs was $102 weekly.

The Goal Is Profit

Having shouldered extra costs and pioneered in bringing a major manufacturing operation into an inner-city slum, the I.B.M. management wanted to make certain it did not fail. So, in hiring, it also "creamed" the slum. The goal of the Bedford-Stuyvesant plant is the same as that of all I.B.M. plants—to make a product at a profit.

And, in the end, this must remain the goal of any business.

With this reality in mind, officials at I.B.M. and other firms active now in slum areas are troubled by a proposed law designed to revitalize slum enterprises. They worry about the impact of the Community Self-Determination bill, now pending in Congress, which would give a Federally chartered Community Development Corporation (C.D.C.) the power to acquire, create and manage businesses and to negotiate "turn-key" contracts with outside firms. These firms would have to agree to sell to the C.D.C. as soon as a community-based operation became profitable.

The product of a strange alliance between black power separatists and conservative Congressmen, this bill has supporters with ties to both camps. It provides tax and loan incentives for businesses willing to participate in slum enterprises under these conditions, but no one at the conference here showed such a willingness. Most felt that the bill would stifle business investment rather than stimulate it.

Business at the Harvard conference favored other approaches, such as increasing Federal reimbursement for job-training programs and making loan funds more available. They also urged that municipal governments make the establishment of slum operations far easier. Officials at I.B.M., for example, report running into excessive costs in setting up operations in Brooklyn and becoming inexcusably tangled in bureaucratic red tape.

Business involvement in slum areas needs encouragement. An observer at the conference came away convinced of this. The limits of this involvement, however, need understanding. A business is not a social agency and cannot be expected to perform tasks that properly belong to Government and society. A business is, in the end, a business.

Current Issues

TAXES

The basic issues of tax reform

As Congress and Administration start reviewing tax laws, first principles take on fresh meaning. One target will be changes in how the tax structure bites

Just before World War II ended, Randolph Paul, one of the great public finance experts of his day, wrote an impassioned plea for tax reform and called the resulting book, Taxes Without Tears.

It has taken 25 years. But both a Republican Administration and a Democratic-controlled Congress now sense a middle-class revolt against the existing tax structure. The effect is to increase greatly the chances that the U. S. will finally get at least some changes in its tax laws embodying the kind of reform that Paul, and the succeeding generation of public finance experts, have been urging for more than a quarter of a century.

Will these changes end the tears? The answer depends on what benefits the public expects to reap from the drive for reform.

Premises. The beginning of wisdom, say the reformers, is to understand that reform will not mean a tax cut for taxpayers viewed as a whole—or substantial reduction for the mass of individual taxpayers, for that matter.

The experts, in fact, go on to argue that if the revolt is against a rising burden of taxation, the wrong Bastille is being stormed.

To support their case, they cite evidence that the tax percentage bite on income has remained essentially unchanged since 1954, the last time the U. S. tax code underwent an item-by-item review. The burden of state and local taxation has increased from about 8% to about 10% of per capita income since that date, but the impact has been offset by a general downward drift in federal taxation.

The federal tax burden has come down a shade, of course, partly because state and local taxes can be claimed as a deduction on the federal return. In addition, the effect of the great 1964 tax cut hasn't been quite offset by the imposition of the surcharge last year.

Escalator up. Yet the middle classes are unhappy. "The problem," says one noted tax expert, "is prosperity." Prosperity has made April a crueler month for many taxpayers. Because of the enormous rise in income since World War II, many families have moved into higher tax brackets. They are paying the high income tax rates that applied to relatively few taxpayers only 15 years ago.

The current 10% standard deduction applying to persons reporting a taxable income of $10,000 or less has also become obsolete. When it was first set up, it was used by more than 75% of taxpayers; now it is used by only about 50%.

As a result, the public is now more sharply aware of the kinds of problems that have worried tax experts since the days of Randolph Paul, and perhaps before him. Basically, the U. S. tax system has evolved since World War II when the income tax was changed from a levy on the classes to a levy on the masses. In so doing, it has moved farther and farther away from principles regarded as sound ever since Adam Smith.

Equal treatment. Sound principles of public finance require that people in equal circumstances be treated equally. For the tax man, equal income represents one critical test of equal circumstance. Yet, as the tables at right show, differing taxpayers in the same bracket often pay differing rates on their total income.

Differences in effective tax rates—

total federal taxes as a percent of total income—including things like capital gains that are not fully counted in taxable income and interest on state and local bonds which is not counted at all—already begin to show up in the $3,000 to $5,000 tax bracket. By the time the $10,000 to $15,000 bracket is reached, rates begin to vary substantially. Most taxpayers in this group pay an effective rate between 15% and 20%, but 6% pay effective rates of 10% to 15%, while 7% pay from 20% to 25%.

In higher brackets, discrepancies get bigger and bigger between effective rates on people in approximately the same income class. Rates for millionaires vary all over the shop. Almost 50% of all taxpayers reporting incomes over $1-million pay effective rates between 20% and 30% on total income. But 4% of all those in this class pay less than 5%, while another 7% are in the maximum bracket of 65% to 70%.

Power to pay. Sound principles of taxation also require that people in different circumstances be treated differently—or, put another way, that tax rates bear some reasonable relationship to ability to pay.

Indeed, the federal tax system does comply reasonably with this principle. Its effective rate goes up from an average of 15% for total incomes of less than $5,000 to 32% for those in the $50,000 to $100,000 bracket, and then stops rising.

But state and local governments rely heavily on sales taxes that tend to take a bigger bite from low-income families (also families that don't save much) than from high-income families.

Thus, the total tax structure is less progressive than that of the federal government alone. A Council of Economic Advisers study shows taxes take much the same percent of revenue from all taxpayers with incomes ranging all the way from $2,000 to $15,000 per year. The effective rate rises from that point.

Incentives. Finally, there are some principles that say taxes should not interfere with the way resources are allocated among various uses. Yet, under the current code, there are unquestionably tax advantages to deploying resources in agriculture, in timber, in minerals, and in some kinds of real estate operations.

All the deviations from ideal principles have a common cause: the exemptions, deductions, and exclusions that have been an important part of the tax structure ever since the 1930s. Since taxpayers in the same bracket can claim differing exemptions, deductions, and exclusions, there are big differences in the tax treatment meted out to them. Since many of the rich have sources of income that can claim special tax treatment, average rates don't vary as much with income as the tax table suggests. And since some kinds of enterprises get special tax treatment, the use of resources sometimes gets distorted.

The reformers. For all these reasons, the thrust of the current drive for tax reform is squarely aimed either at eliminating or reducing exemptions, deductions, and exclusions, or at least modifying their effects on the rates that taxpayers actually pay.

Proposals for reform have a common aim. But they come in all kinds of packages, from the radical to the bland.

At one end of the spectrum are tax reformers who would hack away ruthlessly at all exemptions, deductions, and exclusions. Their chief ammunition is an appealing piece of arithmetic, which might be labeled the law of one-third. The total tax loss from the special treatment of some kinds of income costs the Treasury about $44-billion a year, roughly one-third of total collections. Eliminate them, say the radical reformers, and basic tax rates could be cut one-third.

Minimum tax? The rich do get more out of special tax treatment than middle-class taxpayers. But cutting of various deductions won't mean a big reduction in the tax burden of the middle class.

This kind of calculation shows up clearly in the arithmetic underlying the proposals for a minimum income tax on the rich, contained in the proposals for tax reform that the

The average federal income tax rate varies with income—but not by as much as the federal tax table suggests

Johnson Administration passed on to the Treasury. This "Surrey Package"—named for former Assistant Treasury Secretary Stanley S. Surrey—estimated the revenue from this minimum tax at only about $1-billion, against total estimated tax receipts of $128-billion for fiscal 1969.

To get general rate reduction as a result of reform, Congress would have to do something radical like reducing those exemptions, deductions, and exclusions that are widely used by the mass of taxpayers as well as the rich—such things as interest on home mortgages, charitable contributions, and interest on consumer debt.

Although House Ways & Means Chairman Wilbur C. Mills has a record of caution on tax questions, he has been talking more and more like a radical reformer in recent weeks. In a television interview last weekend, he argued for "simplification"—the elimination of special treatment coupled with "lower basic rates." This resembles the position taken by the Senate's liberal Democrats, who, for their support of the 10% surcharge last year, extracted a pledge that the Treasury would submit tax reform proposals to Congress.

Opening moves. The Nixon Administration has taken a moderate position so far. Treasury Secretary David M. Kennedy has promised to begin sending proposals for reform to Congress soon, emphasizing the need for "equity." He placed particular stress on changing provisions that allow some of the rich to avoid almost all federal taxation.

Still, the Administration will have to resolve some problems in its own tax stance before it can make a convincing case for reform. During the campaign, President Nixon talked of massive tax credits as incentives to induce private enterprise to tackle ghetto problems.

Testifying before the Joint Economic Committee this week, Budget Director Robert Mayo was asked by Representative William S. Moorhead (D-Pa.) whether "the incentives of today become the loopholes of tomorrow?" Mayo's reply: "I think I understand the question you raise, and we will have to be watchful."

Sources close to Mills say that he is not overly happy with Administration statements to date. He told intimates that "what they mean by tax reform is not what I mean by tax reform."

Just how those differences are resolved will hold the key to the tax reform package that Congress will actually pass. End

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE WHITE HOUSE has announced that Pres. Nixon has sent 94 directives to various top officials of his Administration "calling for action and recommendations on a wide range of domestic concerns."

The subjects on which the President wants these recommendations range from tax reform and federal expenditures to health care and welfare programs. All of them, of course, are of importance to organized labor, but a number of them are in the field of direct labor legislation.

Because they indicate the issues that the President is thinking about, they are worth listing. Here are those referred to Labor Sec. George P. Shultz:

● A report on the advisability of establishing a labor court to help deal with labor-management problems. The labor court is a favorite scheme of anti-union business groups which complain that the National Labor Relations Board is pro-union and that the only way management can get a break is to abolish the NLRB and set up special labor courts which, presumably, will be tough on labor. Sec. Shultz has said that he doesn't think much of the labor court idea.

● Recommendations concerning a pilot government program designed to encourage the unemployed to move to locations where jobs exist.

● Draft legislation for a comprehensive manpower bill along with an appraisal of the expected costs and benefits of implementing such a program. This, of course, would open the way to implementation of the Nixon proposals to bring private enterprise into the job and training picture more than it now is, perhaps by giving tax breaks to corporations that involve themselves in the project.

● Recommendations concerning the proposed increase in the minimum wage and its impact on employment opportunities. Shultz already has made it clear that he currently has reservations about the $2 minimum for which organized labor is calling.

● A report on the advisability of placing farm workers under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Organized labor has long called for this as the only way to assure farm workers of their right to organize. Shultz has been quoted in the press as having expressed doubt on the grounds that they are too scattered and that there is a question of calling strikes during harvest peaks.

● Establishment of a special task force to develop a basic policy with regard to public employes' labor disputes. Public employe unions are deeply concerned that government management groups are reluctant to deal with their organized labor on a fair basis; the "right to strike" is still highly controversial, and the techniques of free collective bargaining are far from adequate.

● A report on the deficiencies of the current system of unemployment compensation, and recommendations as to how these shortcomings can be corrected. Such matters include uniformity among the states on compensation, the rate at which benefits should be paid, and the question of unemployment benefits for strikers.

● An appraisal of the present supply of skilled construction workers and the membership practices of construction unions, together with recommendations concerning this issue.

● An evaluation and recommendations concerning the role which the Davis-Bacon Act may have played in increased construction costs. This is somewhat of a surprise issue. Davis-Bacon provides for prevailing wages on government construction and it is not quite clear why the government should want to pay less than prevailing wages even to save money.

● Recommendations concerning new occupational safety legislation. Organized labor has been fighting steadily for federal legislation to meet the shocking death and accident rate in American industry. Business has been fighting to keep safety legislation on the state level where it has been woefully weak.

A Generation Unsure That It Has a Future

By George Wald

Current Issues 1969

ALL OF YOU know that in the last couple of years there has been student unrest breaking at times into violence in many parts of the world: in England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Mexico and, needless to say, in many parts of this country. There has been a great deal of discussion as to what it all means.

Perfectly clearly, it means something different in Mexico from what it does in France, and something different in France from what it does in Tokyo, and something different in Tokyo from what it does in this country. Yet unless we are to assume that students have gone crazy all over the world, or that they have just decided that it's the thing to do, there must be some common meaning.

I don't need to go so far afield to look for that meaning. I am a teacher, and at Harvard, I have a class of about 350 students—men and women—most of them freshmen and sophomores. Over these past few years I have felt increasingly that something is terribly wrong—and this year ever so much more than last. Something has gone sour, in teaching and in learning. It's almost as though there were a widespread feeling that education has become irrelevant.

A lecture is much more of a dialogue than many of you probably appreciate. As you lecture, you keep watching the faces, and information keeps coming back to you all the time. I began to feel, particularly this year, that I was missing much of what was coming back. I tried asking the students, but they didn't or couldn't help me very much.

But I think I know what's the matter, even a little better than they do. I think that this whole generation of students is beset with a profound uneasiness. I don't think that they have yet quite defined its source. I think I understand the reasons for their uneasiness even better than they do. What is more, I share their uneasiness.

An American Invention

WHAT'S BOTHERING those students? Some of them tell you it's the Vietnam war. I think the Vietnam war is the most shameful episode in the whole of American history.

The concept of war crimes is an American invention. We've committed many war crimes in Vietnam, but I'll tell you something interesting about that. We were committing war crimes in World War II, even before the Nuremburg trials were held and the principle of war crimes started. The saturation bombing of German cities was a war crime, and if we had lost the war, some of our leaders might have had to answer for it.

I've gone through all of that history lately, and I find that there's a gimmick in it. It isn't written out, but I think we established it by precedent. That gimmick is that if one can allege that one is repelling or retaliating for an aggression—after that, everything goes.

And you see, we are living in a world in which all wars are wars of defense. All War Departments are now Defense Departments. This is all part of the double talk of our time. The aggressor is always on the other side.

And I suppose this is why our ex-Secretary of State, Dean Rusk—a man in whom repetition takes the place of reason and stubbornness takes the place of character—went to such pains to insist, as he still insists, that in Vietnam we are repelling an aggression.

And if that's what we are doing—so runs the doctrine—anything goes.

If the concept of war crimes is ever to mean anything, they will have to be defined as categories of acts, regardless of provocation. But that isn't so now.

I think we've lost that war, as a lot of other people think, too. The Vietnamese have a secret weapon. It's their willingness to die beyond our willingness to kill. In effect, they've been saying, you can kill us, but you'll have to kill a lot of us, you may have to kill all of us. And thank heavens, we are not yet ready to do that.

Yet we have come a long way—far enough to sicken many Americans, far enough even to sicken our fighting men, far enough so that our national symbols have gone sour. How many of you can sing about "the rockets' red glare, bombs bursting in air" without thinking, those are our bombs and our rockets bursting over South Vietnamese villages?

When those words were written, we were a people struggling for freedom against oppression. Now we are supporting real or thinly disguised military dictatorships all over the world, helping them to control and repress peoples struggling for their freedom.

Postwar Aberrations

BUT THAT Vietnam war, shameful and terrible as it is, seems to me only an immediate incident in a much larger and more stubborn situation.

Part of my trouble with students is that almost all the students I teach were born since World War II. Just after World War II, a series of new and abnormal procedures came into American life. We regarded them at the time as temporary aberrations. We thought we would get back to normal American life some day.

But those procedures have stayed with us now for more than 20 years, and those students of mine have never known anything else. They think those things are normal. They think we've always had a Pentagon, that we have always had a big army and that we always had a draft. But those are all new things in American life, and I think that they are incompatible with what America meant before.

How many of you realize that just before World War II, the entire American army, including the Air Force, numbered 139,000 men? Then World War II started, but we weren't yet in it; and seeing that there was great trouble in the world, we doubled this army to 268,000 men. Then in World War II, it got to be eight million.

And then World War II came to an end, and we prepared to go back to a peacetime army somewhat as the American army had always been before. And indeed in 1950—you think about 1950, our international commitments, the cold war, the Truman Doctrine and all the rest of it—in 1950 we got down to 600,000 men.

Now we have 3.5 million men under arms: about 600,000 in Vietnam, about 300,000 more in "support areas" elsewhere in the Pacific, about 250,000 in Germany. And there are a lot at home. Some months ago we were told that 300,000 National Guardsmen and 200,000 reservists had been specially trained for riot duty in the cities.

I say the Vietnam war is just an immediate incident, because so long as we keep that big an army, it will always find things to do. If the Vietnam war stopped tomorrow, with that big a military establishment, the chances are that we would be in another such adventure abroad or at home before you knew it.

As for the draft: Don't reform the draft—get rid of it.

A peacetime draft is the most un-American thing I know. All the time I was growing up, I was told about oppressive Central European countries and Russia, where young men were forced into the army, and I was told what they did about it. They chopped off a finger, or shot off a couple of toes; or better still, if they could manage it, they came to this country. And we understood that, and sympathized, and were glad to welcome them.

Now, by present estimates, 4000 to 6000 Americans of draft age have left this country for Canada, another 2000 or 3000 have gone to Europe and it looks as though many more are preparing to emigrate.

A few months ago, I received a letter from the Harvard Alumni Bulletin posing a series of questions that students might ask a professor involving what to do about the draft. I was asked to write what I would tell those students. All I had to say to those students was this: If any of them had decided to evade the draft and asked my help, I would help him in any way I could.

I would feel as I suppose members of the underground railway felt in pre-Civil War days, helping runaway slaves to get to Canada. It wasn't altogether a popular position then, but what do you think of it now?

A bill to stop the draft was recently introduced in the Senate (S. 503), sponsored by a group of Senators that ran the gamut from McGovern and Hatfield to Barry Goldwater. I hope it goes through; but any time I find that Barry Goldwater and I are in agreement, that makes one take another look.

And indeed, there are choices in getting rid of the draft. I think that when we get rid of the draft, we must also cut back the size of the armed forces. It seems to me that in peacetime a total of one million men is surely enough. If there is an argument for American military forces of more than one million men in peacetime, I should like to hear that argument debated.

There is another thing being said closely connected with this: that to keep an adequate volunteer army, one would have to raise the pay considerably. That's said so positively and often that people believe it. I don't think it is true.

The great bulk of our present armed forces are genuine volunteers. Among first-term enlistments, 49 per cent are true volunteers. Another 30 per cent are so-called "reluctant volunteers," persons who volunteer under pressure of the draft. Only 21 per cent are draftees. All re-enlistments, of course, are true volunteers.

So the great majority of our present armed forces are true volunteers. Whole services are composed entirely of volunteers: the Air Force, for example, the submarine service, the Marines. That seems like proof to me that present pay rates are adequate.

One must add that an act of Congress in 1967 raised the base pay throughout the services in three installments, the third installment still to come, on April 1, 1969. So it is hard to understand why we are being told that to maintain adequate armed services on a volunteer basis will require large increases in pay; they will cost an extra $17 billion per year. It seems plain to me that we can get all the armed forces we need as volunteers, and at present rates of pay.

But there is something ever so much bigger and more important than the draft. The bigger thing, of course, is what ex-President Eisenhower warned us of, calling it the military-industrial complex. I am sad to say that we must begin to think of it now as the military-industrial-labor union complex.

What happened under the plea of the cold war was not alone that we built up the first big peacetime army in our history, but we institutionalized it. We built, I suppose, the biggest government building in our history to run it, and we institutionalized it.

I don't think we can live with the present military establishment and its $80-100 billion a year budget and keep America anything like we have known it in the past. It is corrupting the life of the whole country. It is buying up everything in sight: industries, banks, investors universities, and lately it seems also to have bought up the labor unions.

The Defense Department is always broke; but some of the things they do with that $80 billion a year would make Buck Rogers envious. For example: the Rocky Mountain Arsenal on the outskirts of Denver was manufacturing a deadly nerve poison on such a scale that there was a problem of waste disposal. Nothing daunted, they dug a tunnel two miles deep under Denver, into which they have injected so much poisoned water that beginning a couple of years ago Denver began to experience a series of earth tremors of increasing severity.

Now there is a grave fear of a major earthquake. An interesting debate is in progress as to whether Denver will be safer if that lake of poisoned water is removed or left in place. (New York Times, July 4, 1968; Science, Sept. 27, 1968).

Perhaps you have read also of those 6000 sheep that suddenly died in Skull Valley, Utah, killed by another nerve poison—a strange and, I believe, still unexplained accident, since the nearest testing seems to have been 30 miles away.

As for Vietnam, the expenditure of fire power has been frightening. Some of you may still remember Khesanh, a hamlet just south of the Demilitarized Zone, where a force of U.S. Marines was beleaguered for a time. During that period, we dropped on the perimeter of Khesanh more explosives than fell on Japan throughout World War II, and more than fell on the whole of Europe during the years 1942 and 1943.

One of the officers there was quoted as having said afterward, "It looks like the world caught smallpox and died." (New York Times, March 28, 1968).

The only point of government is to safeguard and foster life. Our Government has become preoccupied with death, with the business of killing and being killed. So-called defense now absorbs 60 per cent of the national budget, and about 12 per cent of the gross national product.

The Facts of Death

A LIVELY DEBATE is beginning again on whether or not we should deploy antiballistic missiles, the ABM. I don't have to talk about them; everyone else here is doing that. But I should like to mention a curious circumstance.

In September, 1967, or about 1½ years ago, we had a meeting of MIT and Harvard people, including experts on these matters, to talk about whether anything could be done to block the Sentinel system, the deployment of ABMs. Everyone present thought them undesirable, but a few of the most knowledgeable persons took what seemed to be the practical view, "Why fight about a dead issue? It has been decided, the funds have been appropriated. Let's go on from there."

Well, fortunately, it's not a dead issue.

An ABM is a nuclear weapon. It takes a nuclear weapon to stop a nuclear weapon. And our concern must be with the whole issue of nuclear weapons.

There is an entire semantics ready to deal with the sort of thing I am about to say. It involves such phrases as "those are the facts of life." No—these are the facts of death. I don't accept them, and I advise you not to accept them.

We are under repeated pressures to accept things that are presented to us as settled—decisions that have been made. Always there is the thought: Let's go on from there! But this time we don't see how to go on. We will have to stick with those issues.

We are told that the United States and Russia between them have by now stockpiles in nuclear weapons approximately the explosive power of 15 tons of TNT for every man, woman and child on earth. And now it is suggested that we must make more. All very regrettable, of course, but those are "the facts of life."

We really would like to disarm, but our new Secretary of Defense has made the ingenious proposal that one must be practical. Now is the time to greatly increase our nuclear armaments so that we can disarm from a position of strength.

I think all of you know there is no adequate defense against massive nuclear attack. It is both easier and cheaper to circumvent any known nuclear defense system than to provide it. It's all pretty crazy. At the very moment we talk of deploying ABMs, we are also building the MIRV, the weapon to circumvent ABMs.

The Doomed Survivors

SO FAR AS I know, with everything working as well as can be hoped and all foreseeable precautions taken, the most conservative estimates of Americans killed in a major nuclear attack run to about 50 million. We have become callous to gruesome statistics, and this seems at first to be only another gruesome statistic. You think, Bang!—and next morning, if you're still there, you read in the newspapers that 50 million people were killed.

But that isn't the way it happens. When we killed close to 200,000 people with those first little old-fashioned uranium bombs that we dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, about the same number of persons was maimed, blinded, burned, poisoned and otherwise doomed. A lot of them took a long time to die.

That's the way it would be. Not a bang, and a certain number of corpses to bury, but a nation filled with millions of helpless, maimed, tortured and doomed survivors huddled with their families in shelters, with guns ready to fight off their neighbors, trying to get some uncontaminated food and water.

A few months ago, Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia ended a speech in the Senate with the words: "If we have to start over again with another Adam and Eve, I want them to be Americans, and I want them on this continent and not in Europe." That was a United States Senator holding a patriotic speech. Well, here is a Nobel laureate who thinks that those words are criminally insane. (Prolonged applause.)

How real is the threat of full-scale nuclear war? I have my own very inexpert idea, but realizing how little I know and fearful that I may be a little paranoid on this subject, I take every opportunity to ask reputed experts. I asked that question of a very distinguished professor of government at Harvard about a month ago.

I asked him what sort of odds he would lay on the possibility of full-scale nuclear war within the foreseeable future. "Oh," he said comfortably, "I think I can give you a pretty good answer to that question. I estimate the probability of full-scale nuclear war, provided that the situation remains about as it is now, at 2 per cent per year." Anybody can do the simple calculation that shows that 2 per cent per year means that the chance of having that full-scale nuclear war by 1990 is about one in three, and by 2000 it is about 50-50.

A Dubious Future

I THINK I know what is bothering the students. I think that what we are up against is a generation that is by no means sure that it has a future.

I am growing old, and my future, so to speak, is already behind me. But there are those students of mine who are in my mind always; there are my children, two of them now 7 and 9, whose future is infinitely more precious to me than my own. So it isn't just their generation; it's mine, too. We're all in it together.

Are we to have a chance to live? We don't ask for prosperity, or security; only for a reasonable chance to live, to work out our destiny in peace and decency, not to go down in history as the apocalyptic generation.

And it isn't only nuclear war. Another overwhelming threat is in the population explosion. That has not yet even begun to come under control.

There is every indication that the world population will double before the year 2000, and there is a widespread expectation of famine on an unprecedented scale in many parts of the world. The experts tend to differ only in their estimates of when those famines will begin. Some think by 1980; others think they can be staved off until 1990; very few expect that they will not occur by the year 2000.

That is the problem. Unless we can be surer than we now are that this generation has a future, nothing else matters. It's not good enough to give it tender, loving care, to supply it with breakfast foods, to buy it expensive educations. Those things don't mean anything unless this generation has a future. And we're not sure that it does.

I don't think that there are problems of youth, or student problems. All the real problems I know are grownup problems.

Perhaps you will think me altogether absurd, or "academic," or hopelessly innocent—that is, until you think of the alternatives—if I say as I do to you now: We have to get rid of those nuclear weapons. There is nothing worth having that can be obtained by nuclear war: nothing material or ideological, no tradition that it can defend. It is utterly self-defeating.

Those atom bombs represent an unusable weapon. The only use for an atom bomb is to keep somebody else from using it. It can give us no protection, but only the doubtful satisfaction of retaliation. Nuclear weapons offer us nothing but a balance of terror, and a balance of terror is still terror.

We have to get rid of those atomic weapons, here and everywhere. We cannot live with them.

All One Species

I THINK we've reached a point of great decision, not just for our Nation, not only for all humanity, but for life upon the Earth. I tell my students, with a feeling of pride that I hope they will share, that the carbon, nitrogen and oxygen that make up 99 per cent of our living substance were cooked in the deep interiors of earlier generations of dying stars.

Gathered up from the ends of the universe over billions of years, eventually they came to form in part the substance of our sun, its planets and ourselves. Three billion years ago, life arose upon the Earth. It seems to be the only life in the solar system. Many a star has since been born and died.

About two million years ago, man appeared. He has become the dominant species on the Earth. All other living things, animal and plant, live by his sufferance. He is the custodian of life on Earth. It's a big responsibility.

The thought that we're in competition with Russians or with Chinese is all a mistake, and trivial. Only mutual destruction lies that way. We are one species, with a world to win. There's life all over this universe, but we are the only men.

Our business is with life, not death. Our challenge is to give what account we can of what becomes of life in the solar system, this corner of the universe that is our home, and, most of all, what becomes of men—all men of all nations, colors and creeds.

It has become one world, a world for all men. It is only such a world that now can offer us life and the chance to go on.

Some 1200 scientists, students and others gathered in Kresge Auditorium of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology March 4 under the aegis of the "March 4 Movement" protesting the misuses of science. The participants "were disturbed," according to the Boston Globe, "at the lack of focus in the day's numerous panel discussions and speeches" until Dr. George Wald rose to speak.

Dr. Wald is professor of biology at Harvard and 1968 winner of the Nobel Prize for medicine. As in his lectures at Harvard, he "talked extemporaneously, his head back, his eyes almost closed," said the Globe. "His words had an electric effect. A hush fell over the audience, broken just once by sustained applause midway in the speech and climaxed by a prolonged standing ovation at its conclusion."

This is the speech.

The country is growing more impatient about the size of the defense budget and its social effects.

But we believe that Congress, as a whole, has not shown sufficient sensitivity to these issues and to the public's anxieties about them. Our role is to accelerate an awareness of the dangers inherent in the defense budget, the arms race, and the militarization of our society.

We meet here as committed public officials and as representatives of a troubled people. Our concerns are:

A country which continues to wage war when that war is discredited; the missiles and anti-missiles which proliferate—while citizens wonder what this generation of defense experts has in store; The hundred billion dollars alloted for defense in a single year, when teacher corps funds are reduced by half; The two-thirds of all tax receipts that are spent for defense, more than all federal, state and local outlays for social security, health, education, housing and agriculture; A military budget which rises each year, spurred by a seemingly self-generating mechanism, functioning with little or no attention to merit.

—Cong. Ben Rosenthal, March 28, 1969

"THANK THE LORD FOR SMALL FAVORS LIKE THE MODIFIED ABM"

Down the long lane of the history yet to be written America knows that this world of ours, ever growing smaller, must avoid becoming a community of dreadful fear and hate, and be, instead a proud confederation of mutual trust and respect.

"Such a confederation must be one of equals. The weakest must come to the conference table with the same confidence as do we, protected as we are by our moral, economic, and military strength. That table, though scarred by many past frustrations, cannot be abandoned for the certain agony of the battlefield.

"Disarmament, with mutual honor and confidence, is a continuing imperative. Together we must learn how to compose differences, not with arms, but with intellect and decent purpose. Because this need is so sharp and apparent I confess that I lay down my official responsibilities in this field with a definite sense of disappointment. As one who has witnessed the horror and the lingering sadness of war—as one who knows that another war could utterly destroy this civilization which has been so slowly and painfully built over thousands of years—I wish I could say tonight that a lasting peace is in sight.

"Happily, I can say that war has been avoided. Steady progress toward our ultimate goal has been made. But, so much remains to be done. As a private citizen, I shall never cease to do what little I can to help the world advance along that road."

—From President Eisenhower's final message to the Nation, broadcast and televised from the White House Jan. 17, 1961.

Cross-section drawing of a future multilevel linear city along a Brooklyn highway

OUR CITIES CAN BE FIT TO LIVE IN if we apply the same talent and resources we now apply to space and defense. The tunnelling of urban highways (left) will save many urban neighborhoods. Pre-fabricated housing with assembly line techniques (below) can help meet America's housing shortage, provide jobs, and make living better for city dwellers.

Americans are asking for leadership

The problems of crime, congestion, and pollution seem almost too much for most American cities.

Yet most Americans have not lost hope. Most Americans want leadership. Most Americans feel that most city problems can be straightened out.

New technology—using some of the same productive facilities, the same scientific talent, the same determination both private industry and government employ for space and defense—can be used to spruce up American cities and make them fit to live in again.

Highways now too frequently engineered to destroy the heart of a neighborhood can be tunnelled, as the sketch shown above demonstrates. New housing techniques (using factory-made parts like those shown here) can lower housing costs and fill the housing gap for millions of American families.

There are millions of job opportunities which await all if we begin to tackle the work which needs doing. The cost of remaking America is but a fraction of what we are now spending on our topheavy defense budget.

Many of the same people who build rockets, who build missiles, who build tanks, who build guns—many of the same people can find jobs building the things the nation needs to make our cities fit to live in.

The Lou Harris poll shown here was taken recently to show public attitudes for taking care of city problems. Sixty percent of the American people, the Harris poll shows, say they feel a sense of urgency about the plight of the cities and favor decisive action to solve both racial and housing problems in urban centers. Most think the federal government should shoulder more of the task to remake our cities. But the public shies away from taking on more taxation to pay for the job.

COMPLEX

The same technology

Rockets or houses— that's the big issue

By GUY HALVERSON

Staff correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Americans can remake their cities with cleaner air, better home, easier flow of traffic, less crime, more jobs, and a finer life for all—if the technology which makes guns is used to grapple with domestic problems which confront our whole nation today

The United States could aptly be called the world's largest "military-industrial complex."

It boasts an armed force of 3.5 million. It has 6,000 military bases within its borders. Ten percent of its labor force is involved in either military or defense-related employment. Some 22,000 of its biggest manufacturers are prime military contractors, while more than 100,000 firms contribute some type of output to defense production.

Walk along its streets. You see no barbed wire, no guard posts. Its people are basically generous, outgoing, and friendly. Yet the United States is the world's largest exporter of munitions. And its total expenditure for welfare, education, and poverty programs is less than the amount spent on defense.

Few Americans would question the need for armed strength of sufficient size and excellent quality. Certainly, most would agree that if the past three decades have taught any lesson, it would be the folly of precipitous reduction in national defense while other nations were heavily arming.

Also, wherever defense industries develop, there is a consequent economic growth. For instance, President Nixon has announced that the first two Sentinel missile sites are to be located near Malmstrom Air Force Base in Montana and Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota.

THIS MAP SHOWS how the billion dollar defense pie is cut throughout the 50 states. Many of the same plants which today turn out guns could turn out schools and homes for communities which are ridden with crime and despair. The 1967 defense expenditures come to over $100 billion for that fiscal year. A shift of expenditures to domestic needs would not disrupt employment, if proper planning is done now.

Officials of communities nearby say they welcome these sites because of the expected economic benefits they will bring. Residents in these communities are already accustomed to the proximity of missiles, since Minuteman missile wings are located at both bases.

Charles W. Bullard, chairman of the economic department at the University of North Dakota in Grand Forks, said the new construction "will mean a lot to the state, economically speaking."

"I estimate that for every dollar spent on the installation and maintenance, we will receive $3 worth of income," he said.

Yet, as the military power and defense establishment of the U.S. have grownits authorized army was less than 3,500 in 1805—so, too, have certain misgivings: about the social and political implications of a large military establishment on a democratic society; about economic overdependence on federal contracts for a community engaged in defense production; about the possibility that somehow in some undefinable way, basic American values and attitudes are being subtly perverted or destroyed.

On Jan. 17, 1961, President Eisenhower, himself a product of the American military heritage and a consistent advocate of necessary armaments for defense, startled Americans by forthrightly speaking out about the dangers of a "military-industrial complexx."

"This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in American experience," President Eisenhower said. Its "total influence, economic, political, even spiritual, is felt in every city, statehouse, every office of the federal government."

In December, 1968, Sen. George McGovern (D) of South Dakota reiterated this theme, calling the military-industrial complex "the most serious internal threat facing the United States on the eve of the Nixon administration."

Most industrialists and military officials challenge the contention that a military-industrial complex exists at all, or that corporate defense production endangers the nation.

"As long as we are an American corporation and the U.S. Government has a feeling that they need military equipment, we'd be remiss as a good corporate citizen" if we didn't supply that need, saws William S. Blakeslee, vice-president and group executive for the defense-space divisions of Chrysler Corporation.

Like General Motors, Ford, and such nonautomotive firms as the giant FMC Corporation in San Jose, Calif., Chrysler is active in military production. Chrysler defense and space sales reached some $269 million in 1968, or 3.6 percent of total company sales, compared with 3.4 percent in 1967.

Besides participating in the Apollo program of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Chrysler is a major producer of tanks and special wheeled vehicles and amphibians for the military.

"If all the major corporations in this nation were to get out of defense work it would be dangerous indeed," says Mr. Blakeslee. "The question is, who's to do the defense work? Private industry under congressional and Pentagon controls, or the federal government alone by itself?"

Talks with scores of private citizens and with scholars indicate that the possible dangers of the military-industrial complex—perhaps because of disillusionment with Vietnam—are receiving increased scrutiny. And as debate continues over the proposed Sentinel "thin line" antiballistic-missile system—which, at an estimated cost of between $5 and

Eisenhower warned of the danger of the military-industrial complex which eats up so much of the federal tax dollar today

$10 billion, would be among the most expensive defense programs ever undertaken in American history—these findings emerge:

- Many authorities believe the existence of a mighty defense complex may be preventing industrial diversification.
- The presence of the defense complex in a community may inhibit needed social reform.
- Slowly, imperceptibly, and unconsciously, the American people may well be becoming "conditioned" to the acceptance of regimentation, wiretapping, snooping, and "spying" by large internal, defense-related investigative agencies.
- The "character" of the American managerial system may be undergoing profound alteration because of large-scale defense needs.
- Every facet of public life, from politics to secondary-school education to what is shown on motion-picture screens may be influenced by the growing power of the Pentagon.

"What bothers me is that the [military-oriented] government agencies are taking over the decision-making processes of defense firms," says Murray L. Weidenbaum, head of the economics department at Washington University in St. Louis.

"Most Pentagon contracts are on a 'take it or leave it' basis," he says. "They have 'buy America' clauses and so deny firms the options of buying imported materials. Wages and overtime rates are set by contract. The companies must even follow the safety rules promulgated by the Army Corps of Engineers."

"It is this loss of entrepreneurship and risk bearing that is of concern. But the defense companies themselves are making tremendous profits. In a study, I found that the average return for a defense plant is about 18 percent of net worth, compared to about 11 percent for a similar firm catering to civilian needs. This was true throughout the 1950's, and it's true today," Professor Weidenbaum says.

"While I don't subscribe to the view held by many lawmakers that some kind of 'conspiracy' [between the military and industrial firms] exists," says Rep. Thomas M. Pelly (R) of Washington, "I think that there is certainly a basis of fact upon which the American people should be concerned. Recent revelations with regard to the Sentinel missile system indicate that the military has all along had a carefully thought out program to overcome opposition to its system."

"Boeing has expanded its nonmilitary production," he went on, "Until now it's the world's largest manufacturer of commercial aircraft," says Mr. Pelly, whose Seattle legislative district encompasses many of the workers at the giant Boeing plant. "But when a firm, unlike Boeing, does the bulk—say up to 90 percent or more—of its business with the federal government, maybe the public should be concerned."

As many authorities have noted during the past few years, the economic influence of key defense contractors has become widely pervasive in certain areas of the nation. In 1967 alone, the McDonnell Douglas Corporation (with key plants in St. Louis and the Santa Monica-Long Beach regions of California accounted for more than $2.1 billion

Ten percent of American labor is involved in either military or defense-related employment. That's why the lure of defense spending has become so powerful today. Yet the needs of America's cities for an end to crime, congestion, and pollution is tugging at Congress for help now—not next year or ten years from now in defense contracts; General Dynamics (which in part manufactures nuclear-powered attack submarines at Groton, Conn., and the new, F-111 fighter-bomber aircraft at Fort Worth, Texas) accounted for more than $1.8 billion; Lockheed (which manufactures the C-5A and the C-141 Starlifter aircraft) accounted for $1.8 billion in defense contracts. Lockheed has plants in Marietta, Ga., Burbank, Calif., and Seattle.

In fact, in any region of the nation one can quickly spot the booming defense industries—the dozens of computer and electronics plants in New England; the aircraft facilities of New Ykro, Georgia, California, and Texas; aerospace firms and shipbuilding in the Pacific Northwest.

In the Atlanta area alone, some 26,000 employees earn more than $200 million annually in wages from the Lockheed programs.

According to the Pentagon, for each defense worker participating in just the Lockheed C-141 program (not to mention the C-5A program), one would have to multiply

Americans are taking a new and harder look at defense spending, but there are powerful forces among the military that impede any cutbacks by five to measure the actual number of persons affected. These five people would include butchers, bakers, the neighborhood clothing retailer—even the local schoolteacher.

What this pervasive economic influence means, say many authorities, is the establishment of powerful "coalitions of interest" to maintain specific government defense programs, whether those programs are needed or not. Thus, congressmen become allies of giant defense industries, while unions turn "hawkish" and universities establish "research ties" to specific plants. "Even our local ministers have become champions of our aviation industry," charges one disgruntled Fort Worth, Texas, clergyman.

Pets or people?
—we need to adjust our priorities

Here's an item from the business section of the New York Times telling of the big profits agencies are making in advertising cat foods. And here's an item in the Economist (London) quoting an American doctor at the Senate hunger hearings saying that 800 calories a day isn't enough to support a destitute child in the Delta and maybe not enough to support his worms.

Pets or people—it's a way of saying that poverty and the disparity of income in the United States is the nation's biggest problem, bar none. Something has to be done about it.

"We spend as much for chewing gum as for model cities," Howard J. Samuels, undersecretary of commerce under President Lyndon B. Johnson, once observed. "We spend as much on hair dye as for grants to urban mass transport. We spend as much on tobacco as government at all levels spends on higher education. We spend more on pet food than on food stamps for the poor."

America is not putting enough of its fabulous wealth where it should go; its priorities are confused. The economic problem is no longer how to create wealth; it's how to distribute it more reasonably.

Most other countries have some formal system of governmental income supplements and the United State is zigzagging in that direction too, and must ultimately come to it, but at present we still have a welfare hodge-podge based on charity. For example, one out of every five children in New York City currently receives public assistance. But wouldn't it be better to consolidate the system, as every other modern nation does, into a generalized children's allowance? The United States is alone in having no such system.

The trail-blazing Friends (Quakers) Committee on National Income declares "that a federal system of assuring income is morally right, necessary and economically desirable." Some other churches agree.

America's income is huge but it is dangerously unbalanced in distribution. The 5 per cent at the top get 20 per cent; the 20 per cent at the bottom get about 5 per cent. If you visualize it, it is something like an elongated diamond, wide in the middle but stretched out at either end to the richest and poorest.

We spend more for chewing gum than for model cities, more for hair dye than mass transit, more for tobacco than for higher education, more for pet food than food stamps for the poor

What will the Nixon administration do about poverty? The most steady, consistent theme in the Nixon candidacy last year was that of enlisting "individual initiative and private enterprise" to aid the cities. He spelled this out as a system of providing "tax credits" and "special tax incentives" to business.

Personally, we don't think it will work. It sounds jolly and romantic, of course, and we are all for private enterprise even if it has to be encouraged by federal subsidies to do its stuff.

After all, air and rail lines get income supplements, farmers get them to the tune of $1 billion a year, exporters get them in tariffs, the oil industry in the last 10 years got $30-050 billions from consumers through government-imposed import controls, Senate Anti-trust subcommittee chief economist John Blair testified.

Everybody gets income supplements so why not corporations who go into the ghettos to aid the poor. The only people who should not get income supplements, are the poor themselves. We draw the line there.

—TRB IN THE NEW REPUBLIC

BETTER HOUSES, built cheaper and faster is what American can have it we readjust our priorities.

There are revolutionary techniques waiting to be used, if we but make up our minds to do so.

The President's Committee on Urban Housing—on which UAW President Walter P. Reuther served—called for 26 million new and rehabilitated homes during the next 10 years. To reach this goal, the nation must tackle the housing needs of our people with the same tenacity we employ in space and defense.

The country can attain better housing, using these new methods of construction, if we set our sights high enough.

Why students rampage

"I think I know what is bothering the students. I think that what we are up against is a generation that is by no means sure that it has a future.

"I am growing old, and my future, so to speak, is already behind me. But there are those students of mine, who are in my mind always; and there are my children, the youngest of them now seven and nine, whose future is infinitely more precious to me than my own. So it isn't just their generation; it's mine, too. We're all in it together."—GEORGE WALD, Nobel Prize winning professor of biology, Harvard, speech on March 4, 1969.

'The government ought to crack down on these young radicals who feel justified in destroying public property!'

"About two million years ago, man appeared. He has become the dominant species on the earth. All other living things, animal and plant, live by his sufferance. He is the custodian of life on earth, and in the solar system. It's a big responsibility.

"The thought that we're in competition with Russians and with Chinese is all a mistake, and trivial. We are one species, with a world to win. There's life all over this universe, but the only life in the solar system is on earth, and in the whole universe we are the only men.

"Our business is with life, not death. Our challenge is to give what account we can of what becomes of life in the solar system, this corner of the universe that is our home; and, most of all, what becomes of men—all men, of all nations, colors, and creeds. This has become one world, a world for all men. It is only such a world that can now offer us life; and the chance to go on."

—GEORGE WALD

"Nuclear weapons offer us nothing but a balance of terror, and a balance of terror is still terror."—GEORGE WALD

"As far as I know, the most conservative estimates of the number of Americans who would be killed in a major nuclear attack, with everything working as well as can be hoped and all forseeable precautions taken, run to about fifty million. We have become callous to gruesome statistics, and this seems at first to be only another gruesome statistic. You think, Bang!—and next morning, if you're still there, you read in the newspapers that fifty million people were killed.

"But that isn't the way it happens. When we killed close to two hundred thousand people with those first, little, old-fashioned uranium bombs that we dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, about the same number of persons were maimed, blinded, burned, poisoned, and otherwise doomed. A lot of them took a long time to die.

"That's the way it would be. Not a bang and a certain number of corpses to bury but a nation filled with millions of helpless, maimed, tortured, and doomed persons, and the survivors huddled with their families in shelters, with guns ready to fight off their neighbors trying to get some uncontaminated food and water.

"A few months ago, Senator Richard Russell, of Georgia, ended a speech in the Senate with the words, 'If we have to start over again with another Adam and Eve, I want them to be Americans and I want them on this continent and not in Europe. That was a United States senator making a patriotic speech. Well, here is a Nobel laureate who thinks that those words are criminally insane."—GEORGE WALD

WEEKEND WRAPUP

The political pressures for an end to the shooting in Vietnam are today stronger than the pressures for more war. When Sen. William Fulbright told Defense Secretary Laird this will soon be called "Nixon's war" if we don't get out, the message was clear. Secretary of State Rogers last Thursday assured the Senate he's not for any deeper involvement. Rogers also made clear the Nixon administration knows much of the country has strong feelings against the ABM. . . . One of the most sobering speeches heard during this time of stock-taking came from a Harvard professor, George Wald, who expressed some of the skepticism which now abounds on Capital Hill and knows no political party. Some of Wald's comments appear on page 7 of this issue. The nub of what he said is: "Our government has become preoccupied with death, with the business of killing and being killed. So-called defense now absorbs sixty per cent of the national budget, and about twelve per cent of the Gross National Product." . . . Last week, Cong. Paul Findley, once a hardline conservative Republican from downstate Illinois, filled 120 pages of The Congressional Record with some 31,000 names of Americans killed in Vietnam. It was an eloquent statement which needed no rhetorical embroidery. Americans increasingly feel they have been taken in by the military, although the latest Gallup poll showed only 26 percent favored pulling out of South Vietnam lock, stock and barrel; while 32 percent favor greatly escalating the war, going all-out. As Mr. Gallup puts it: "Discouragement over the recent hard fighting in Vietnam, as well as the unproductive Paris peace talks, have led many Americans to favor more extreme measures to end the conflict in Southeast Asia. Until recently the great mass of people in the United States preferred a middle course between all-out escalation on the one hand and immediate withdrawal on the other. But views lately have greatly polarized and the comments 'go all out' and 'get out' are heard with increasing frequency. A potentially explosive mood may be building up and the public today is perhaps closer than ever before the view that we ought to end the war as soon as possible and get out regardless of consequences. A significant political fact, however, is that up to this point the public has not blamed President Nixon for any lack of progress in the Vietnam situation. The views of a New Jersey housewife reflect the tone of many comments recorded by Gallup Poll interviewers in the latest national survey: 'Frankly, I don't care what happens in Vietnam anymore. I just want to get my son back." . . . The death of President Eisenhower reminds us of his profound parting message to the American people when he left office January 17, 1968. It was a warning that we live in troublesome times with everpresent dangers to the general welfare. But his real message with this: "We have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security more than the net income of all United States corporations. This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. . . . The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.'" . . . Sen. Dirksen blew his cool last week and gave the civil rights movement a new lease on life. Dirksen complained that big business was being badgered by the Equal Employment Commission. Sen. Ted Kennedy came to the defense of the commission's head. Millions of defense budget dollars goes into the pockets of discrimination-guilty: Burlington Industries, J. P. Stevens, Cannon Mills, Cone Mills, Dan River Mills, and Deering-Milliken. . . . That congressional conference on military budget and national priorities may be blacked out in the press by national mourning for Eisenhouer—but it represents a new and insistent political mood in the country. It is historically ironic that the Eisenhower warning on American militarism made over 8 years ago should now come to the forefront dramatically on the very day Eisenhower died.

"Mr. Alexander, I just want to say I hope no one has been threatened in here this morning for trying to do his job. . . . I just wonder how many blacks, Mexican-Americans and Indians can take the time to come to Washington to tell about their discrimination, their harassment."—SEN. TED KENNEDY, last week in reply to badgering of a witness by Sen. Dirksen, who claimed that big businessmen were spending lots of money to fight complaints of job discrimination. Many of the companies have gotten rich on government defense contracts while black Americans die in combat, yet the black men who return home cannot be hired in these same companies.

Urban schools: one year after the Kerner Commission report

Twelve months after the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders' bombshell shattered—temporarily—the nation's complacency, a new missile has begun to hover over the U.S.

Called by its sponsors "One Year Later," it is a report of the past year's reaction to the domestic crisis documented in the first report. Since its release Feb. 27, the new study has startled and grated many Americans who had filed away "Kerner Commission" into some dim storehouse of historical fact.

The new report not only reminds the country of what the Kerner Commission found a year ago. It concludes that:

- "Poverty remains a pervasive fact of life . . . and the continuing disparity between this poverty and the general affluence remains a source of alienation and discontent."
- "Ghetto schools continue to fail. The small amount of progress that has been made has been counterbalanced by a growing atmosphere of hostility and conflict in many cities."
- "At present, there are no programs that seriously threaten the continued existence of the slums."

The report reaffirms the Kerner Commission's conclusion that "education in the slums and ghettos is a failure." This indictment "is just as valid and even more familiar," the new study declares.

"One Year Later" is a joint undertaking of two nonprofit organizations, Urban America, Inc., and the Urban Coalition. A seven-member advisory panel including two members of the original Kerner Commission participated. Urban America, Inc., is headed by former Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, and the Urban Coalition is headed by former HEW Secretary John Gardner. Both are headquartered in Washington.

In a 13-page assessment of educational efforts during the last year (major excerpts of which are printed below), the study finds a "discernible shift to action . . . perhaps the beginnings of genuine change."

The decentralization-community control issue logically occupies much of this portion of the study. While these approaches may offer "a meaningful relinkage of parents and community with what goes on inside the schools," the study warns of dangers. "Will drawing new lines around communities, setting up local boards, reinforce the very segregation and isolation that the Commission warned against?" it asks.

Following are excerpts from "One Year Later:"

THE FIRST STUDY

Education in the slums and ghettos is a failure. The Commission backed this flat assertion with evidence that "in the critical skills—verbal and reading ability—Negro students fall farther behind whites with each year of school completed." In the metropolitan Northeast, Negro students start school with slightly lower scores than whites on standard achievement tests; by sixth grade they are 1.6 grades behind, and by 12th grade 3.3 grades behind. By 12th grade, many have left: In the metropolitan areas of the North and West, a Negro student is more than three times as likely as a white to drop out of school by the time he is 17. The Commission's typical participant in civil disorders was, among his other characteristics, a high-school dropout.

Most city schools are racially segregated because of patterns of residence. The Commission cited a 75-city survey by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission showing that 75 percent of Negro elementary school students attend schools 90 percent or more Negro, while 83 percent of white students are in schools that are 90 percent or more white; a companion sampling of 15 cities showed that 84 percent of the increase in Negro enrollment between 1960 and 1965 occurred in schools with Negro enrollments over 90 percent. The Commission draws from the 1966 Office of Education report "Equality of Educational Opportunity" (the source of the achievement and dropout figures above) the conclusion that racial and class segregation is harmful. Inevitably, all concerned—administrators, teachers, parents, and students—regard Negro schools in the slums and ghettos as inferior, the Commission says, and this helps insure that they are.

Therefore, they attract the least experienced, least qualified teachers: A 1963 study which ranked Chicago schools by the socio-economic status of their neighborhoods showed that in the 10 lowest ranking schools, only 63.2 percent of the teachers were fully certified; in the 10 highest the figure was 90.3 percent. Teachers assigned to schools in the slums and ghettos "often begin with negative attitudes toward the students," the Commission said. "These attitudes are aggravated by serious discipline problems, by the high crime rates in areas surrounding the schools, and by the greater difficulties of teaching students with disadvantaged backgrounds" Such backgrounds produce a disproportionate number of emotionally disturbed and "problem" children, for whom too few special aids are available. Negative attitudes are reinforced—and passed on to the students. "The teachers expect little from their students," the Commission observed; "the students fulfilled the expectation."

CLASS SIZE, OVERCROWDEDNESS

Sheer numbers can overwhelm the teacher in a disadvantaged school. Negro school enrollments have increased faster than total Negro central city population. The Commission described the cycle: "As white students withdraw from a public school, they are replaced by greater numbers of Negro students—reflecting the fact that the Negro population is relatively younger, has more children of school age, makes less use of private schools, and is more densely concentrated than the white population." The result, in the slums and ghettos, is acute and concentrated overcrowding of inadequate school facilities. Washington, D.C., had one predominantly white high school in 1967 operating at 92.3 percent capacity. Its predominantly Negro high schools were operating at 108.4 percent to 127.1 percent capacity.

"Inner-city schools are not only overcrowded, they also tend to be the oldest and most poorly equipped," reported the Commission. Teaching materials are scarce and "poorly adapted to the life-experiences of the students." Behind most of these deficiencies, the Commission said, is the fact that "our society spends less money educating ghetto children than children of suburban families." It cited a Civil Rights Commission study of state aid in 12 metropolitan areas in 1950 and 1964. In two the same amount per pupil went to central city and suburbs, and in six the suburbs got significantly more. Priorities were inverse to need.

The Commission found an atmosphere of increasing hostility around the schools of the slums and ghettos. They "often appear to be unresponsive to the community, communication has broken down, and parents are distrustful of education. . . . Since the needs and concerns of the ghetto community are rarely reflected in educational policy formulated on a citywide basis, the schools are often seen by ghetto youth as irrelevant." The sense of isolation from the making of school policy, the Commission said, "is adding to the polarization of the community."

ONE YEAR LATER

The indictment of failure passed on education in the slums and ghettos is just as valid and even more familiar. But the ferment stirred by the two earlier education reports and accelerated by the Commission report has increased to the point where it is rocking—in some instances, even toppling—the educational establishment. Unlike other drives for change in the schools, this one looks as if it will not end with talk: There is a discernible shift to action—clarification of strategies, heightened conflict, perhaps the beginnings of genuine change.

Not all of the turmoil is progress. Frustration has taken its toll, and any remedy that offers the glimmer of reaching the disadvantaged is seized upon. As in the larger society of which the schools are part, the dilemma is whether changes that accentuate, rather than mitigate, polarization are a necessary prelude to coming together on an equal footing—indeed, whether there is any choice.

At present the dilemma centers on community control of schools, raised by blacks in the slums and ghettos to an urgency well beyond the Commission's careful treatment of "decentralization." The major battleground, of course, was in New York City, where experiments in community control have unleashed a bitter power struggle and surfaced a nightmare of ethnic and racial hatreds. Despite the tragic public conflict, there were stories, perhaps premature in their optimism, that in the schools themselves a new atmosphere, with new methods and new teachers, was "turning on" previously alienated students. In Washington, a lesser-known experiment in community control resulted in an upturn in reading scores despite a chaotic first year, and the school has settled into an innovative but orderly second.

Elsewhere, decentralization of the schools was being widely talked about and only tentatively and less widely tried. In Chicago, an experimental four-school subdistrict was set up with a board representing the central board, the University of Chicago, and local community groups to make decisions about how federal funds are used. In 13 Los Angeles schools, a local board of parents, teachers, and students has "critical" authority over budgets and the use of materials and teachers. In Boston, several schools have in effect been pulled out of the city system and are run by a local board receiving funds from the state of Massachusetts.

PLUSES AND MINUSES

Many questions remain. On the plus side, both decentralization and community control answer directly the problem of alienation by offering a meaningful relinkage of parents and community with what goes on inside the schools which, if the theory is correct, will both improve the education of the ghetto kids and renew the community in the fullest sense. It offers real change, responsibility, and accountability.

The dangers, however, are just as obvious. Will drawing new lines around communities, setting up local boards, reinforce the very segregation and isolation that the Commission warned against? What is the larger public interest and how is it expressed? When do confrontations become counterproductive, creating a dangerous new problem that once again turns us away from the children?

In a study of 13 cities prepared for the Urban Coalition, the authors found a wide variety of mechanisms by which parents have been involving themselves meaningfully in school decision-making, suggesting perhaps that the gradation of alternatives between a centralized board and total community control have not been fully examined. The authors say that the rhetoric of control is more widespread than its practice; few parents really want to "run" their schools. But they do want something called "accountability," where they can look at and assess what the schools are accomplishing.

Part of the rhetoric of community control is disdain for the goal of integration. Resisted by the white community, it now has few public friends among the vocal blacks. Swamped by the publicity for the separatist push, however, desegregation efforts have gone on, both at the federal level, and more importantly, in cities and towns across the nation where individuals and organizations have persisted in fighting for it. Mostly, these efforts, both federal and grass roots, are in smaller and moderate sized cities, where distance and numbers make for a more manageable game.

A number of communities adopted desegregation plans in the past year: Niagara Falls, New York; Evansville, Indiana; San Mateo, California; Providence, Rhode Island. The most dramatic, comprehensive integration plan was installed in 1968 in Berkeley, California, a city of 125,000 with an overall population 25 percent black and a school population 41 percent black. After a decade-long community struggle, led in most recent years by peripatetic school superintendent Neil V. Sullivan, the elementary program last year, moved 2,000 white children and 2,000 black out of a total of 5,000. Each of the 14 elementary schools reflects roughly the overall racial percentage. Reports out of Berkeley are optimistic: The added costs are less than 3 percent of the budget; predictions of teachers resigning and whites fleeing are not proving out; intensive community relations and teacher training programs are underway.

In most other cities, integration plans are more limited or voluntary; within city boundaries, there is bussing and rezoning often on the basis of equalizing crowding, which incidentally also reshuffles some black and white bodies. In Providence, a ghetto school was made into a special academically oriented school and is now 70-percent white with a long waiting list. More plans for moving inner-city children out to the suburbs have cropped up and existing ones have been expanded. Boston's groundbreaking operation now busses 850 children to 20 communities.

But progress is slow and resistance solidifying. At least 10 suburban school boards turned down cooperation with a Hartford experiment. Law suits are underway contesting the fully paid-for presence of the D.C. children in Bannockburn. A state-ordered plan in Mount Vernon, New York, similar to Berkeley's, is tangled in community dissension and court litigation.

COMPENSATORY PROGRAMS

If disillusionment plagues the goal of integration, it is no less the case with the Commission's parallel education strategy, the improvement of ghetto schools through compensatory programs. It has struck the supporters of such programs, who had overemphasized the possibilities of quick success; the economizers, who don't like spending all that money, and now a third group which says the programs won't work until students achieve a sense of destiny control in community-run schools.

The focus of this disillusionment in educational circles in 1967 was New York City's ambitious and expensive More Effective Schools program, which brought to bear a battery of the kind of innovations proposed by the Commission on selected disadvantaged schools at an average added cost of $470 per pupil. An evaluation damned the program for not closing the reading and mathematics gap, and it became something of a political (and professional) football. Late last year another evaluation decided MES was having an impact after all—but by then all eyes were on the titanic struggle over decentralization.

Also last year, the Office of Education published a compendium of 150 "outstanding" compensatory projects funded under Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, running the gamut from work-study programs, health services, remedial reading and tutoring programs, teacher education, and summer sessions to free breakfasts. OE has a "Follow Through" program which attempts to sort out the approaches that work best for teaching young children. It touches on the Commission's major strategies, seeking comparative information about the benefits of curriculum change, lower pupil-teacher ratios, racial and socioeconomic mix, use of community aides, and community control. In 1968, Follow Through was expanded to include some 60 intentionally varied programs that will be evaluated for their impact on the children's achievement, self regard, and social competence.

A related OE effort is the focusing of multiple programs on the same child. After the Detroit riots, School Superintendent Norman Drachler, in consultation with OE officials, worked out a program to concentrate a variety of program funds for the disadvantaged—medical, dental, employment, Titles I and III (special aid for innovative programs) and so on. This became a model for OE's Central Cities project, announced in 1968, to give $13 million of Title III money to 125,000 students for a "broad span of educational activities" in specific schools and neighborhoods in 26 cities. Different strategies are being used, involving early childhood education, transition to work, teacher training, and community involvement.

Title I, which has been priming disadvantaged schools with about a billion dollars annually since 1965, itself came up for evaluation of its second year of operation. The report expressed cautious optimism about what was being accomplished. Achievement levels were moving up, but not nearly enough to wipe out the gap between poor and nonpoor students. Some used the report to pronounce compensatory education a failure; others protested that the experiment was damned before it had barely begun. OE Commissioner Harold Howe II insisted that after three years of operation, the Title I efforts were beginning to pay off in real change, not just "add-ons" to more of the same.

The Title I appropriation was spared the Congressional paring suffered by other education programs: Funding remained about the same billion dollars a year as previously. Although hailed as a victory, this was a substantial cut from the original authorization of $2.7 billion. A billion dollars a year sounds like a healthy sum, but it comes down to $108 per assisted pupil—not very much considering that it goes to schools that have been systematically underfunded and to children whose needs are overwhelming. The per-capita amount is actually declining, partly because the number of children benefiting has been going up, partly because the money is spread around to several million children that no one would call disadvantaged.

The law earmarked Title I money for school districts with "concentrations of children from low-income families." Congress, however, defined this to mean any district with at least 10 poor children—qualifying such wealthy suburbs as Montgomery County, Maryland; Scarsdale, New York; and Shaker Heights, Ohio. The funds, moreover, can be used for such schoolwide services as guidance programs and libraries, further diluting their impact on poor children. The most recent report of the National Advisory Commission on Disadvantaged Children made this judgment: "Title I funds—while spent for entirely worthy purposes—have simply failed to achieve the overall purpose of the legislation."

As recommended by the Civil Disorders Commission and others, Howe made a determined effort last year to get school districts to concentrate Title I money on fewer students so that more models of excellence could be developed. There is no clout behind the commissioner's revised "criteria," however, since the ultimate decisions about the expenditure of Title I money are made by the state and local school districts. The issue is steamy politically, since concentration in one area means withdrawal from another.

IT TAKES MONEY

Eventually, any realistic discussion turns back to funds. There can be no substantial difference in the quality or equality of education for a large number of children without institutional and process change—but it will also take lots of money for leverage. The federal contribution to education—now about 8 percent of the total—has leveled off. The trend is to block or broad grants passed through the state departments of education. Decisions on Title III grants for innovative programs were switched by Congress last year from OE to the states. Commissioner Howe took a parting shot at the states before he left office, warning that federal block grants for elementary and secondary schools should be for "national purposes which have national priorities." Said Howe, "Unless such funds find their purposes designated by Congress, they will not be used to make changes in schools in behalf of children . . . who are ill-served by the schools as they are."

There is, nevertheless, a rethinking underway of the legal and financial responsibility of states. If education is indeed so central to curing poverty, the quality of service—or at least dollar input—can no longer be a geographical accident, producing inequities not only between one region or state and others, but between city and suburb in the same metropolitan area. As the Commission data showed, state contributions based on outdated aid formulas often accentuate the disparities. City children end up with less per capita, even though it costs more to deliver the same educational services to them than to suburban children, and they need much more.

In a head-on attack on the system of state aid, six cases were filed last year —in Chicago, Detroit, Los Angeles, San Antonio, Muskogee, Oklahoma, and Bath City, West Virginia—to define "equality of educational opportunity" and pin down the state's responsibility for providing it. Some of the suits argue for equal expenditure; others that equal protection of the laws requires unequal expenditures based on the city child's extra needs.

The Chicago suit was thrown out by the U.S. District Court in November which claimed that although the state aid formula was unequal, the remedy was in the legislation, not the courts. The plaintiffs—students and parents—intend to pursue their case in the Supreme Court. A particularly strong case is being built for an upcoming suit filed by the Detroit Board of Education against the State of Michigan [with the support of the Detroit Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 231 . . . ed.].

Perhaps no measure of the break in faith with the public school system is as telling as the proposals coming from all sorts of respectable people—conservative economist Milton Friedman, Henry Levin of Stanford University, Dean Theodore Sizer and Christopher Jencks of the Harvard Graduate School of Education—that parents of poor children be given public funds in the form of vouchers to "shop" for a better education in competing non-religious private schools.

This radical (and possibly illegal) idea is supported by the success of the educational programs that have sprung up outside of the "straight" school system —the street academies, the MIND program, black culture store-front schools. Although these reach only a fraction of the youngsters rejected by the schools, they demonstrate the simple truth that the same student who fails in one situation can succeed in another.

SOME IMPACT

The near despair surrounding education in the slums and ghettos has had an impact, although not in terms of producing a massive solution to sever the predictability that now exists between a child's race and family income and his schooling. No one has a remedy that he can prove works. Nevertheless, the percentage of Negroes aged 25 to 29 who are high school graduates has risen to 58 in 1968, up 8 percent from 1966. (The comparable 1968 figure for whites was 75 percent.) The schools have introduced many changes to cope with a failure that no one even talked about less than a decade ago.

RESHAPING URBAN SCHOOLS:

Putting teacher power to work

The monumental task of reshaping urban education in the United States is being undertaken by, among others, classroom teachers. Teachers in the big cities, who for the most part are organized into the AFT, are using the weapon of collective bargaining to bring about educational change.

The problems identified in the Kerner Commission report and reviewed in "One Year Later" are AFT concerns, and AFT locals are making strides, in their contracts with school boards to solve problems. Perhaps the best known AFT-initiated program is "More Effective Schools," operating now in four cities and planned for three more soon. Other common collective-bargaining contract provisions include limitations on class size, relevant curriculum material, and the hiring of community personnel as teacher aides. All are recommended in the Kerner report.

Here is a report on the impact AFT is having in these areas:

THROUGH MES

"I don't want to be a Jeremiah," Simon Beagle, AFT educational consultant told the New York City Commission on Human Rights in a hearing Dec. 9, "but unless we seriously reconstruct our school to meet the increasing number of challenges created by our rapidly changing society and modes of production, our society will create its own gravedigger: a growing number of unemployables sufficiently alienated from such society as to be willing to destroy it."

Beagle, who has led the union's fight for More Effective Schools (MES) since 1965, was pleading for an expansion of the program in New York City. There are 21 such schools—the epitome of compensatory education programs—in New York City today. They limit class size to 22, there are four teachers for every three classes, and there are psychologists, reading teachers, and other specialists on every school staff. "They have become educational oases," Beagle said. The concept for them was initiated by the AFT's New York City local in 1965.

The schools are described as having an impact in meeting urban school problems, both in "One Year Later" and by the USOE, which has designated the MES program as one of 21 (out of 1,000) "outstanding" urban school projects. Since their establishment, periodic evaluations of reading and math scores have shown longitudinal improvements in achievement far above children in other schools in the same city. A new evaluation, to be released by the NYC school board next month, is expected to show even sharper differences between MES and non-MES students.

More Effective Schools were part of the contract demands last year in Baltimore, New Haven, and Detroit. In each case, the board of education agreed to the AFT's proposals and put MES into operation.

This year, AFT bargaining agents in Cleveland, Chicago, and Washington, D.C., asked for MES programs. They had little trouble in selling the idea to their school boards, and programs will start in these cities soon.

"Meanwhile, in other cities across the country, AFT locals, regardless of whether or not they are bargaining agents, are working for MES implementation, and thus doing their share in the educational revolution," Beagle said.

PARENT SUPPORT

Bringing parents into the classrooms as teacher aides is described in the Kerner Commission report and in "One Year Later" as a key factor in reducing community alienation. Again, most AFT contracts provide for such programs.

In Chicago, the new Chicago Teachers Union agreement provides for the hiring of 900 teacher aides in elementary schools, and another 900 in high schools. Paraprofessionals are working in Philadelphia, Washington, D.C., Baltimore, New York City, Detroit, and most other large cities because of AFT pressure to hire them.

In New York City, the United Federation of Teachers, AFT Local 2, won the right to send Spanish-language reports to parents in the Puerto Rican and other Spanish-speaking communities. In Washington, D.C., the Washington Teachers' Union, AFT Local 6, has a provision in its new contract that new classrooms will be opened up in storefronts, apartment buildings, etc., to permit the schools and community to be "closer" to one another. In Detroit, the union has asked for citywide meetings of the school board to be televised, and has won time off from school for teachers to visit their students' homes.

At the national level, the AFT has adopted as an official policy, the encouragement of elected representation in the operation of schools in the black, Puerto Rican, and other minority communities. Many locals are working on decentralization proposals now, including the UFT, which is submitting proposals to the New York state legislature.

SMALLER CLASSES

Most educational authorities agree that the size of a class of students has a direct bearing on the quality of instruction. The Kerner Commission report and "One Year Later" comment on the negative influence of overcrowdedness in the schools.

One of the chief goals of every AFT local is, therefore, to reduce class size. The most recent victory to this end is in Baltimore, where the Baltimore Teachers Union, AFT Local 340, has won nearly 10 percent across-the-board reductions in class sizes for next fall. In grades K-1, the maximum will be 32, and in 2-12, 34. Next year, the sizes will be cut again.

OTHER CITIES

In Chicago, a class-size formula has been won by the Chicago Teachers Union, AFT Local 1, which sets primary classes at a ceiling of 30 students, intermediate at 33, and upper grades, at 35. Limits of 25 to 28 are placed on high-school English classes, depending on their type.

Detroit enjoys a maximum of 30 pupils in grades 1-3 in 50 inner-city schools with greatest need; Taylor, Mich., has a limit of 33 in grades K-6 and 35 in 7-12, and New York sets the limits from 29-34, depending on the grade level and type of school.

LEARNING IT LIKE IT IS

The recent settlement at San Francisco State College, which provides for funding an ethnic studies program, shows the role that teacher power can play in making the curriculum more relevant. The SFSC local of the American Federation of Teachers struck for nearly two months, one of their demands being for a curriculum which would relate to the community. As part of the concession wrung out of the SFSC administration, S. I. Hayakawa, acting president, agreed to implement an ethnic-studies program in the fall, and money was found to fund it.

ELIMINATING RACIST TEXTS

In a recent contract settlement reached between the Washington (D.C.) Teachers' Union, AFT Local 6, and the school board, it was agreed that textbooks and other curriculum materials will be made available for each pupil in all subject classes in order to "cover in depth the contributions of Afro-Americans and other minority groups in each unit taught." A joint union-board committee was empowered to eliminate racist teaching materials and select replacement books, films, and other teaching aids.

Other examples:

"Multi-ethnic" classroom material will be used (Oak Park, Mich., Federation contract). Courses in Afro-American history will be instituted in senior high schools (Highland Park, Mich., Federation contract). More involvement of teachers in textbook selection and curriculum guide review is provided (Detroit, Mich., contract). Almost every state can match these kinds of provisions in the AFT contracts in effect in their cities.

'. . . well-balanced analysis'

"One Year Later" is a timely and well-balanced analysis of the state of the nation a year after the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (Kerner Commission). A year and a half after the terrible riots in Newark, Detroit, and elsewhere, segments of the report may very well be accepted as AFT policy.

The underlying commitment of the Urban Coalition and the authors of "One Year Later" is still integrationist. While declaring the importance of local community participation in school policy as essential for reduction of school-community hostility and alienation, "One Year Later" is a moderate recommendation for American social policy. It may well serve during the coming year as a wise reassurance of our national purpose.

The Economy, Taxes & Equal Opportunity

The National Economy

The economic outlook for 1969 is clouded by uncertainty about the degree of slow-down during the course of the year and the policies that the new Administration will pursue.

The pace of economic expansion is already slowing down and the government's brake on economic growth may be going too far. Moreover, its emphasis on slowing residential construction, while maintaining special tax subsidies for business investment, is misguided. Interest rates have soared to unprecedented heights. There is danger of rising unemployment.

Some slower economic pace was to be expected this year, after the 5 percent real expansion of 1968, the seventh consecutive year of economic growth. The temporary surtax, adopted in 1968, is withdrawing about $11 billion a year from consumers and business to pay for part of the increase in military spending. The hold-down on government expenditures, ordered by Congress last year, has placed a lid on the amount of additional funds the government can put into the economy's spending stream. The increase in social security taxes, effective January 1, is withdrawing about $1½ billion a year from employes and a similar amount from business to pay for improved social security benefits. In addition, the buying power of the average worker's weekly take-home pay increased only slightly last year, after accounting for taxes and the 4.2 percent rise in living costs.

On top of these dampening developments, new restrictive government measures have been imposed in the early weeks of 1969:

- The prime interest rate that the commercial banks charge their richest customers and best credit risks was raised to an unprecedented 7 percent—an effective prime rate of over 8 percent because of the banks' requirement that such borrowers maintain an interest-free deposit. This boost in the prime rate is raising interest rates all along the line—to medium-sized and small businesses, to home-buyers, farmers, consumers and the government. Some new federal securities have been floated in recent weeks at the highest interest rates in over 100 years. These high costs for borrowed money are being built into the price structure, from manufacturer to retailer and consumer—to the profit of the banks and other lenders. In addition, these high interest rates, accompanied by the Federal Reserve's squeeze on bank credit, threaten a sharp slow-down of economic activities.
- The government increased the interest rates on FHA and VA mortgages from the high 6¾ percent rate of early January to 7½ percent—an effective rate of 8 percent when insurance is included. This peak rate on government-backed mortgages, on top of the excessive rates for builders' loans, is boosting the cost of homes, which the home-buyer is required to pay for the entire term of the mortgage. These costs are narrowing the home-buying market. A slow-down of residential construction is threatened, instead of the vast home-building expansion that is needed.

Moreover, there have been statements by some officials of the new Administration—as well as by business spokesmen—that a substantial rise of unemployment may be required to achieve greater price stability.

The notion that there is an inevitable, mechanical trade-off between inflation and unemployment is economically false and loaded with social dynamite. Advocates of this neanderthal view have never explained how a million additional unemployed can possibly reduce such price pressures as physicians' fees, hospital charges, auto and property insurance rates, which have risen sharply in the past decade. Yet a rise in unemployment would hit the most vulnerable workers hardest—the most recently hired, the least skilled, particularly Negroes, other minorities and young workers.

Furthermore, relative price stability can—and must—be achieved without a growing army of unemployed. Expanded manpower training programs, an effective nationwide employment service and reduction of bottlenecks can help. But most essential to achievement of relative price stability is lower profit margins and reduced profit rates of return on investment.

Indeed, the inflation of recent years has been largely a profit inflation. Profits skyrocketed between 1960 and 1966 and, after a dip in 1967, they moved up again last year. Business Week (February 8) reports: "In 1968, U.S. corporations earned more money than they ever did before in a single year—thanks in good part to sharply rising prices."

Business profits have soared, far out of line with other major types of income. Between 1960 and 1968:

- After-tax profits skyrocketed 91 percent.
- Dividend payments to stockholders soared 84 percent.
- But the weekly, after-tax take-home pay of the average non-supervisory worker increased only 31 percent and, in terms of buying power, merely 11 percent.

These trends are creating economic and social imbalances. An increased share of the nation's income has been shifted to profits. And the profit-laden corporations are continuing to boost their investments in new and improved plants, machines and equipment—after a 100 percent rise between 1960 and 1968—although industry's operating rate is only about 84 percent of existing productive capacity. This situation, which has been contributing to inflationary pressures in recent years, threatens to create a future gap between the economy's rapidly growing capacity to produce and lagging demand for goods and services.

1. The AFL-CIO Executive Council insists that full employment must be the nation's primary economic goal. The government's tax, expenditure and monetary policies for an adequate rate of economic growth should be supplemented by manpower training measures and a federal program to create jobs for the remaining hardcore unemployed and underemployed in providing needed public services.

2. Residential construction must be sheltered from the ravages of the credit-squeeze and unprecedented interest rates.

The 7 percent investment tax credit should be repealed—to curb the flow of available funds into business investment and provide additional funds for home building.

The provision of double depreciation should be repealed on all new construction, except low- and moderate-rental housing.

The Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development should direct FNMA (Fannie Mae) to assist low- and moderate-income housing, at the lowest possible interest rate.

The development of the new form of government security, authorized by the Housing Act of 1968—government-backed mortgage bonds — should be speeded up to attract new investment funds into housing.

3. The government's monetary policy should be eased at the first signs of a general economic softening and rising trend of unemployment. Moreover, a thorough congressional review of monetary policy is needed—for the development of a policy that is in the best interest of the nation and the American people, rather than merely the banks and other lenders.

4. The trend of unemployment in the months ahead and the level of military expenditures should be key factors in deciding whether the temporary surtax should be terminated in mid-year, phased out or continued.

A rising trend of unemployment in the coming months would be a strong reason to terminate this temporary tax or to begin to phase it out. If the surtax is continued for another six months or a year—or if part of it is maintained—the surtax rate should be applied to income that is now excluded from federal taxation, as a result of the major loopholes for capital gains, oil and mineral depletion allowances and income from state and local bonds.

5. Reform of the tax structure is long overdue—to eliminate loopholes of special tax privileges for wealthy families and business, to establish a minimum tax that will end tax avoidance and to reduce the relative tax burden on low- and moderate-income families.

6. A substantial rise in the buying power of wages, salaries and fringe benefits is needed to provide wage and salary earners with a fair share of economic progress and to strengthen the consumer foundation of the national economy.

The lag of real wages and salaries must be ended. Rapidly rising productivity and great business profits make possible substantial improvements in workers' earnings, within the context of a relatively stable price level.

7. Rising business profits should be based on an expanding sales volume, rather than on swollen profit margins at the expense of consumers and workers—to curb pressures on the price level and to provide an improved economic balance between wages, profits, dividends and other forms of income.

8. We are disturbed by the accelerated rate of economic concentration in the past few years—including conglomerate mergers and one-bank holding companies—and the impact of this trend on the national economy. We urge the Congress and appropriate government agencies to make the facts fully known to the public and to curb the adverse impact of this trend.

Tax Reform

The basic inequities in the federal tax system can be simply stated:

1. Many of the wealthiest individuals in the United States pay not one single cent in federal income taxes, but

2. Many of the poorest individuals in the country, who live in what the government defines as poverty, are forced to pay federal income taxes.

In the opinion of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, this is a reprehensible situation which must be corrected. We can no longer tolerate a double standard of taxation, which heaps an unfairly great part of the burden of running the federal government on the shoulders of America's middle-income families, many of whom are trade unionists.

We insist America must achieve a standard of tax fairness and we are therefore pleased that the House Ways and Means Committee has announced its intention of conducting a full-fledged tax reform investigation.

Major reform of the federal tax structure has been talked about for many years. Yet on April 15, 1969, those who receive billions in capital gains from stock market and real estate transactions, from tax-free interest on state and local bonds, from oil and other unjustifiable mineral depletion allowances and from other forms of unearned income, will still enjoy special tax shelters. Some will use their "foundations" and family trusts as tax-dodging schemes and tax loopholes will still be a major crop of many operators of large farm enterprises. The transfer of large sums by gift and at death will still be accomplished by evasions that make taxation based on ability to pay a sham. Fast depreciation will provide real estate operators with tax-free bonanzas, which are also major factors in the rise of land costs and rents. Some wealthy individuals will don the mantle of philanthropy, but they will use the unlimited charitable-deduction loophole and the federal government will honor their pledges.

In 1967, 21 individuals who reported incomes above $1 million and 155 who reported incomes of $200,000 or over, paid not a dollar of federal income tax.

In contrast, some 2.5 million persons whose incomes fell below the government's "poverty line" paid $100 million in federal income taxes.

These loopholes of special privilege for wealthy people and corporations take their toll of the public's confidence in the federal income-tax structure. They are also expensive in dollars.

Just three major loopholes—capital gains, exemption of state and local bond interest, and tax windfalls to oil, gas and other mineral operations—cost the Treasury approximately $7 billion in 1968.

The 7 percent tax credit for investment in machinery and equipment produces over $2 billion for corporations. Moreover, this special tax privilege contributes to difficulties in the money market and adds to upward pressures on interest rates.

Most of these loopholes have developed over a quarter century of horse-trading for special privileges, frequently under the guise of promoting or encouraging an activity in the national interest. Unfortunately, the cost of these special privileges in terms of dollars, inequity, wastefulness and taxpayer confidence have far outweighed any benefits.

Yet despite this sad record, it is becoming increasingly fashionable in some circles to advocate additional tax loopholes for wealthy people and corporations in the guise of panaceas for virtually every national ill that can be identified. There is talk of adding new tax gimmicks for real-estate operators, many of whom are now more accurately considered in the business of constructing tax shelters rather than shelters for people. And there are tax forgiveness proposals ranging from those which supposedly would provide incentives to industry for on-the-job training and inner-city industrial development to those which would encourage gold mining.

Those who make these proposals would further reward those who already more than adequately share in America's affluence and use as their excuse the plight of those who are today in trouble because they do not have their fair share.

We view such schemes as haphazard, costly and wasteful approaches to meeting the nation's goals. Tax forgiveness has the same impact on the federal budget as a direct expenditure. Yet, through such gimmicks, the federal government relinquishes budgetary control to the wealthy investors and businesses who reap most of the benefits. When a privileged few are provided shelters that enable them to avoid their fair tax share, others must reach deeper into their pockets.

We believe that the nation's interest cannot be served through tax forgiveness schemes or other forms of "no-strings" federal aid that are not subject to the congressional scrutiny of specific programs, whose funds must be used in line with national priorities, under federal performance.

The Congress and the new Administration must assign top legislative priority to substantial and thorough-going reformation of the federal income tax structure.

We call for:

1. Elimination of the loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and corporations.
2. A minimum tax on all income over a total which would provide protection for legitimate small investors but which would require at least some tax payment from those whose huge incomes are now preferentially taxed or totally tax-exempt.
3. Removal of the impoverished from the federal income-tax rolls.
4. Reduction in the relative tax burden for low and moderate-income families.
5. Rejection of proposals for new tax loopholes, which would provide additional benefits for wealthy people and businesses and create even more inequities in the federal tax structure.
6. Unequivocal dismissal of all proposals for a federal retail sales tax. Whether such proposals are called "value-added" taxes or offered clearly as a tax on consumers, the effect is the same—those who can afford it least bear the brunt of the burden.
7. Repeal the provision of double depreciation on all new construction, except low- and moderate-rental housing and the 7 percent tax credit for business investment in machines and equipment.

Economic Progress of Minorities

The fact that large numbers of Negroes, Mexican-Americans and other minorities remain outside the mainstream of America's economic and social order is among this nation's most pressing domestic problems.

Despite the persistence of this problem, the significant advances of recent years are testimony to America's capacity for attaining a solution. Federal legislation assuring equal opportunity is now on the statute books. The nation's economic progress—built in part on the recent federal manpower, housing and anti-poverty programs, minimum wage legislation and the historic breakthrough of federal aid to education—has planted seeds whose results are yet to be fully realized.

As a result, unemployment among non-white adult men declined from 11.7 percent in 1961 to 3.9 percent in 1968—solid and unmistakable progress. Despite this improvement, unemployment among adult non-whites is double the rate among whites and joblessness among Negro teenagers in 1968 was 25 percent, a disastrous level.

Recent improvements in employment, education and skills have brought increases in the family incomes of many Negroes and other minorities. By 1967, the median income of non-white families was up to 62 percent of the median of white families—an unsatisfactory situation, but a considerable improvement over the 50-55 percent ratios of most of the 1950s and early 1960s.

These beginnings need encouragement, support and expansion. There is yet a long and hard road ahead. But the achievements of recent years point the way toward the only rational means of achieving a sound solution of this problem.

For the vast majority of Negroes and other minorities, the route into America's mainstream is manpower skills, education and jobs at decent wages.

The essential underpinning is a national commitment to full employment. Federal expenditure, tax and monetary policies for maximum economic growth must be supplemented by a national public service employment program—to create jobs, linked with training and supportive services, for the unemployed and seriously underemployed in both rural and urban areas.

Federal manpower programs should be expanded and adequately financed—to provide the unemployed and underemployed with adequate skills that are needed in the job markets, as well as literacy training, counseling and medical assistance.

The forward momentum of federal aid for education, including vocational education, must be maintained. Adequate educational opportunities, to the maximum of the student's capacity, must be made available to all, regardless of race, creed, color or family finances.

Full funding, implementation and expansion of the housing and community facilities legislation of recent years is essential if America is to provide decent homes for all her citizens in the next ten years.

Effective enforcement of the civil rights legislation of recent years is a must.

Sound government and private efforts to assist Negroes and other disadvantaged minorities who wish to establish business enterprises should be provided. The critical need is capital formation and technical assistance. The government should establish machinery to provide long-term, low-interest loans and technical assistance to meet this need.

These varied policies and measures are essential to accelerate the upward mobility of members of minority groups into the nation's mainstream.

To do this, American's goal must be the rapid elimination of ghetto conditions and the ultimate elimination of the ghetto itself.

Some people, however, have urged that this route be abandoned for an emphasis on so-called black capitalism.

At its best, this policy is an illusion. In a society where 90 percent of those who are at work are wage and salary earners—on private and public payrolls—only a small number of people can move into the economy's mainstream through self-employment and small business. Thus sole or major emphasis on this policy would undermine or kill the jobs-skills-education-housing measures that are essential for the overwhelming majority of Negroes and other minorities.

At its worst, "black capitalism" is a dangerous, divisive delusion—offered as a panacea by extremists, both black and white, some businessmen who see a chance for profit and a few well-intentioned but misguided liberals.

Attempts to build separate economic enclaves, with substantial federal tax subsidies, within specific geographically limited ghetto areas, is apartheid, anti-democratic nonsense.

It is also unworkable, for the ghettos are in fact a part of the nation, their inhabitants are Americans and small pockets of urban or rural poverty cannot be made into viable, separate economic entities. The gross national product, produced by an interdependent national economy, should be shared fairly by all Americans.

Moreover, the "black capitalism" proposals to create huge, new tax loopholes for business to locate in ghetto areas is also bad tax policy. If enacted, these loopholes would attract small sweatshops or some marginal plants of big companies—with little additional employment at decent wages, but with considerable tax benefits to the companies.

Some legislative proposals for separate economic enclaves would create development corporations in each ghetto area, with authority to control the economic life of the area. Such control could be used by extremists to harass businessmen, black and white alike, within these geographically defined enclaves.

Separatist economic schemes offer no hope for the solid advance of the overwhelming majority of disadvantaged minorities into America's mainstream. But they do present a real threat of further division, additional conflict and bitter frustration.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council is unalterably opposed to separatist schemes. We reaffirm our consistent commitment to the principle of integration and the goal of full and equal opportunity for all Americans.

We will continue and redouble our efforts to enable Negroes and other disadvantaged minorities to move as rapidly as possible into the nation's mainstream.

The way to do it is to put massive federal money, manpower and muscle into the programs we have endorsed in this statement—within a framework of full and equal opportunity for all Americans.

America knows the route to solving its minority problems; it needs only the will to reach its goal.

UAW WASHINGTON REPORT

printed every Friday in Washington, D. C., by UAW Community Action Programs Department

Vol. 9, No. 14 April 7, 1969

United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW

"The deep rumblings of a taxpayer's revolt are becoming more audible as the small and middle income homeowner is forced to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden while the rich, by taking advantage of the many loopholes available to them, escape paying their fair share."

—WALTER P. REUTHER, testimony on tax reform before House Ways and Means Committee, April 3, 1969

Sweeping tax reform must tax rich harder, ease burdens on others

UAW President Walter P. Reuther last Thursday proposed sweeping reform of the nation's tax laws which now overburden the poor while permitting many of the wealthy to escape their fair share—or any share—of the tax load.

Reuther's recommendations were submitted to the House Ways and Means Committee.

He detailed three basic principles that should underlie any tax system in a free society:

1) the achievement of justice and equity based upon the principle of ability to pay,

2) non-interference with the natural processes of the economy except to the extent such interference is a matter of planned public policy to meet national goals, and

3) simplicity in tax filing and paying.

At the present time, he said, persons who live below the poverty line pay as much as 34 percent of their income in federal, state and local taxes while those receiving $25,000 or more in a year pay only 28 percent.

Figures for the last year available, 1966, show that 12,088 tax returns listing incomes in excess of $15,000 required "not one cent of income tax," Reuther pointed out.

Out of these non-taxable returns, he added, 367 reported incomes of more than $100,000 and 18 had incomes in excess of $1 million.

At the other end of the scale, Reuther said, "we are taxing many families who live in actual poverty, and taxing into poverty families who are on the verge.

"These inequities and the abuses which make them possible would be grossly unacceptable at any time.

"But they are absolutely indefensible and intolerable at a time when our country is at war, when our young men are being required to offer up their lives in that war, and when 99 percent of us at home are not only paying our regular taxes, but are paying a 10 percent surcharge in addition."

In these circumstances, he said, "it is indefensible that

Here's what you can do about it: There are many things which you as a taxpayer can do to hasten tax reform. With April 15th fast approaching, make sure you get a letter off to your own Congressman at the same time you file your own tax return to the federal government. If Congress knows loud and clear that the American taxpayer is tired of letting the very rich have a free ride at your expense, you can be sure Congress will close the tax loopholes. But if you are silent, then the loopholes will stay and possibly get bigger. Letters should go care of House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

whole classes of income, such as interest on state and municipal bonds, should be absolutely free of federal income tax.

"It is indefensible that while every cent of a working man's pay check is subject to the keen eyes of Internal Revenue, capital gains, acquired through speculation, totally unearned income, should be given treatment which permits them to be taxed at half rates or less.

"It is indefensible that donations to charity can be so arranged that the donor actually makes a profit on his gift . . .

—that some vastly wealthy corporations are enabled to escape a large proportion of the tax burden borne by other business enterprises . . .

—that wealthy 'gentleman farmers,' so called, should be permitted to write off fictitious tax 'losses' and not only escape their share of the tax burden but put the commercial farmer at a competitive disadvantage . . .

—(and) that rich men, by setting up trusts for the benefit of their families, should be able to escape a large part of the taxation . . ."

To avoid taxation of families living in poverty, Reuther proposes that exemptions be increased to $1,800 for the taxpayer and $900 for each dependent and that an annual adjustment be made to the exemptions to reflect movement in the consumer price index.

He recommended that employes not be taxed for Social Security on money earned which is below the poverty level, with the difference made up by the Federal Government from general revenues. And he urged broad liberalization of the standard deduction including an increase in the ceiling to $1,800.

To protect the elderly, Reuther endorsed a U.S. Treasury Dept. proposal which would increase exemptions to $2,500 for aged single persons and $4,200 for a couple.

He called on the committee to study a system of tax credits in place of the present exemption system so as to relieve the poor of their unfair tax burden and at the same time, eliminate the inequity which permits the wealthy greater tax advantage from exemptions than those with smaller incomes.

"We would hope that the extra revenues obtained by plugging loopholes would be sufficient that part of them might be used to meet the pressing social needs of our time—the problems of our cities and our rural slums, the health and housing needs of the people, the education of our children, the need to clean up the air and water around us.

"We in the UAW are sure," he said, "that we speak what is in the minds and hearts of the overwhelming majority of the American people when we urge you to bend every effort to achieve thorough-going reforms which will establish justice and equity based upon the principle of ability to pay."

TAX REFORM URGENT

Rich escape paying fair share while men die in Vietnam combat

Walter P. Reuther told Congress it is "absolutely indefensible and intolerable" for the wealthy to escape taxes while young men are dying in Vietnam.

The labor leader told the House Ways and Means Committee that Congress should quickly plug the major tax loopholes and help low income people as the priority items in its tax reform plans.

In prepared testimony, Reuther suggested reforms to stop high income taxpayers from avoiding taxes through capital gains, oil depletion allowances, tax-free municipal bonds and "fictitious" farm losses.

"The deep rumblings of a taxpayer's revolt are becoming more audible as the small and middle income homeowner is forced to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden while the rich, by taking advantage of the many tax loopholes available to them, escape paying their fair share," Reuther said.

Reuther said tax inequities are "grossly unacceptable" at any time."

"They are absolutely indefensible and intolerable at a time when our country is at war, when our young men are being required to offer up their lives in that war, and when 99 percent of us at home are not only paying our regular taxes, fairly and in full, but are paying a 10 percent income tax surcharge in addition," Reuther said.

"In such circumstances, it is indefensible that whole classes of income, such as the interest on state and municipal bonds, should be absolutely free of federal income tax," Reuther said.

Tighter money or the Teacher Corps

Are Congress and the White House at loggerheads? What has been happening since the beginning of the year with a new President and pretty much the same Congress? Here's a report in depth which tells where the country stands on serious issues ranging from education to conservation, health to transportation.

A LOOK SO FAR

During the first three months of the Nixon Administration and the 91st Congress, not much has happened. The Democratic Study Group's analysis on the next five pages tells in detail what Congress has done and what the White House has done. It's not a happy picture. The country is drifting while enormous problems pile up. We have the highest interest rates in our history—7½ percent for prime bank loans—but the Teacher Corps, the symbol of a new determination to grapple with social unrest, is still plagued by fiscal malnutrition, true even while Democrats controlled the White House.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Congressional Action:

Two major bills have been introduced in the area of civil rights. One would extend the Voting Rights Act of 1965 for an additional five-year period during which literacy and other tests would continue to be suspended and federal officials would be available to register voters.

The other measure would expand the jurisdictional scope of the Equal Employment Opportunity provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This would more effectively prevent discrimination in employment by including both industries in commerce employing at least eight persons and labor unions having at least eight members. Hearings on these measures have not been scheduled as yet.

A special subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee is presently investigating the civil rights enforcement policies of the Nixon Administration.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent any programs or messages to Congress regarding civil rights.

"Good morning, Mr. President! And what's on your mind today?"

CONSERVATION

Congressional Action:

A major bill, the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1969 (H.R. 4148) has been reported out by the House Public Works Committee. The measure would authorize $343 million for programs and research in oil and other matters which pollute U.S. waters; place absolute liability on oil firms for pollution damage from off-shore drilling rigs beyond the three-mile limit; provide penalties for neglect by firms or individuals not taking proper action to clean up and control discharge; and strengthen the ability of the Secretary of the Interior and the Coast Guard to prevent such pollution. The Senate Public Works Subcommittee on Air and Water Pollution has also held hearings on this bill.

Other pending bills which deal with pollution would authorize an incentive tax credit for a portion of the cost of construction or providing facilities for control of water or air pollution; and would prohibit spoil and other waste materials from being dumped into navigable U.S. waters. Several marine resources proposals have also been introduced.

Many other bills on conservation and public power have been introduced and referred to various committees. These include bills on mines and minerals; fish and wildlife; parks, wilderness and other wildlands recreation; reclamation; saline water conversion; atomic power facility licensing; electric power efficiency and reliability; and underground transmission of electric power.

Administration Action:

The President has sent no programs or messages to Congress regarding conservation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

Congressional Action:

Several consumer protection proposals are under consideration in the House, including more than 800 bills to create a cabinet-level department of Consumer Affairs which would coordinate the administration of consumer services. The Senate Government Operations Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization held hearings on the bill.

Other pending consumer bills include proposals to protect consumers against erroneous and malicious credit information gathering agencies; prohibit disclosure of credit information by insured banks and institutions unless authorized by the person about whom information is sought; provide an independent federal agency in Lending Act of 1968 to require greater standards of care in the issuance of unsolicited credit cards; and provide federal funds to the states for the establishment of Consumer Protection offices.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent any messages or proposals to the Congress.

EDUCATION

Congressional Action:

The House Education and Labor Committee has reported the first major social welfare measure of 1969—a five-year extension of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and the Impacted Area Program. The measure will come before the House on April 16.

The other major education bills are awaiting hearings. The education titles of the Full Opportunity Act (H.R. 3338), would make grants available to local education agencies for planning and implementing programs for more effective schools in areas with large numbers of children from low-income families. It would also authorize long-term, low interest loans to students in post-secondary institutions.

The Higher Education Scholarship Act (S. 366) would provide scholarships of up to $1,000 per year to all undergraduate students to enable all students to complete at least two years of higher education.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent any programs or messages to Congress regarding education. However, HEW Secretary Finch, in testimony before the House Education and Labor Committee, recommended extension of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act for two years rather than five as provided by the legislation under consideration.

ELECTORAL REFORM

Congressional Action:

Many proposals for Constitutional amendments reforming the electoral college have been introduced by members of both the House and the Senate. Most call for direct election of the President. Other proposals would (1) retain the present distribution of electoral votes, but eliminate the office of elector; (2) allocate electoral votes by congressional district or by state in accordance with the percentage of the popular vote received by each candidate in that state; or (3) combine a national preferential primary election to select the candidate with final election by popular vote. Hearings on these proposals have been held by both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees.

In another area of electoral reform, several plans for reducing the voting age to 18 or 19 have been introduced. No hearings have been held on these measures yet.

Administration Action:

The President has proposed that each state's electoral votes be apportioned by the percentage of the popular vote received by a candidate in that state, and that if no candidate receives more than 40% of the total electoral vote, the winner would be decided in a run-off election.

The President has not sent a message or proposal to Congress on lowering the voting age.

FOOD AND AGRICULTURE

Congressional Action:

The House Agriculture Committee has reported H.R. 5554, which would amend the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 to make the special milk program permanent and increase the annual authorization from $120 million to $125 million.

Several food stamp bills are before the House and Senate Agriculture Committees. Two in the House would increase appropriations for the food stamp program for fiscal 1970 from $340 million to $440 million and the six remaining months in calendar 1970 from $170 million to $220 million. Two bills on food stamps have also been introduced CONGRESS IS MOVING while the Nixon administration is feeling its way cautiously, as this report shows. Much of America's problems cannot be swept under the rug by happy talk. Congress has begun to make some moves, but there is little which is coming from the White House in the way of initiatives or support.

in the Senate. One would authorize free food stamps when necessary to achieve adequate diets; the other would establish minimum nationwide eligibility standards for food stamp recipients and would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to operate programs in areas where the local governments do not cooperate.

The Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs has held extensive hearings on hunger this session. After testimony on hunger in South Carolina was presented, Secretary of Agriculture Hardin initiated a temporary program of free food stamp distribution to persons with incomes under $30 a month in Beaufort and Jasper counties in South Carolina.

The House Agriculture Committee has held hearings on amending the Rural Electrification Act of 1936 to provide an additional source of financing for the rural telephone program.

Other bills before the House Agriculture Committee would limit agricultural subsidy payments to $10,000 to any one producer in any one year and would provide for the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities through certain conditions such as collective bargaining. Hearings have not been scheduled yet.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent any messages or proposals to Congress regarding agriculture or hunger.

By this same time, Kennedy had provided outline of his administration, and Eisenhower had done the same. The nation still waits for Mr. Nixon to explain his intentions to the people.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND DEFENSE POLICY

Congressional Action:

The Senate on March 13 by a record vote of 83-15 consented to U.S. ratification of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The House, on March 12, passed H.R. 33, to authorize a $480 million U.S. share of a $1.2 billion replenishment for the International Development Association, an affiliate of the World Bank. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will schedule hearings on the bill after the recess. It also authorized supplemental appropriations of $76 million for military aircraft improvements and modifications for fiscal 1969.

Congress is considering several authorization and appropriation bills requesting funds for the Antiballistic Missile System. The House Foreign Affairs Committee, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and the House and Senate Armed Services Committees are conducted or have conducted hearings on the system. Hearings will continue after the recess.

Several Congressional committees are looking into military spending. A new Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee chaired by Senator Symington will look into military and industrial influence on foreign policy. The House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on National Security Policy and Scientific Developments has been reactivated and held hearings on the ABM. A House Government Operations subcommittee is investigating the charge that the Bureau of the Budget gives "kid-glove" treatment to Pentagon requests.

Administration Action:

The President requested passage of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The President ordered deployment of a "modified" version of the ABM system which he says would cost $6-$7 billion.

HEALTH

Congressional Action:

Several bills on protecting the health and safety of coal miners have been introduced in Congress. The bills would set mandatory interim health and safety standards until research into the problem provides the Secretary of Interior with enough information to initiate permanent standards. The House Education and Labor General Subcommittee on Labor held hearings on these bills as did the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Subcommittee on Labor.

These are also a number of bills requiring a more explicit warning statement on cigarette packages and a statement of the average tar and nicotine yield per cigarette. Hearings have not been scheduled.

Hearings are now underway in the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on the Hill-Burton Act extension and amendments. This bill (H.R. 6797) would amend the Public Health Service Act to extend the program of grants for construction and modernization of hospitals and other medical facilities.

The Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1969 (H.R. 843, 3809, and 4294) is being reintroduced this session after failing to receive a rule last Congress. This bill is designed to assure safe and healthful working conditions for working men and women and would provide for research in the field of occupational safety and health.

The select Committee on Labor of the House Education and Labor Committee is now holding hearings on H.R. 3290, which would promote health and safety in the building trades and construction industry in all federal and federally-assisted construction projects.

A major bill on drugs (S. 950) would establish a national drug compendium of prescribing information designed to provide reliable and comprehensive drug information for practitioners and other interested persons. This measure was referred to the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee; no hearings have been scheduled.

Administration Action:

The Administration has proposed comprehensive mine safety legislation which is being considered by House and Senate committees.

At hearings on the Hill-Burton Amendments, HEW Secretary Finch called for changes in the present program of federal grants for hospital construction and modernization in order to control rising medical costs. He proposed that federal aid to states expand outpatient clinics, neighborhood health centers and other non-hospital health facilities. He also proposed replacing present grant system with a $500 million loan program.

HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS

Congressional Action:

Among housing bills filed to date is S. 527, which would make available five percent of funds authorized for use in Rent Supplements and programs for rental and cooperative housing for lower-income families for a proposed housing allowance experimental program. It would also increase authorization for capital grants for urban renewal and supplemental grant funds for Model Cities. The bill was referred to the Senate Banking and Currency Committee; hearings have not yet been held.

Two other bills (S. 1 and H.R. 9280) would provide relocation assistance to persons displaced by federally conducted or federally-aided land acquisition programs. The Senate Government Operations Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee held hearings on S. 1; the House Banking and Currency Committee has not scheduled hearings on H.R. 9280 yet.

Administration Action:

The President has sent no messages or proposals to Congress regarding housing or urban affairs.

JOB OPPORTUNITY AND POVERTY

Congressional Action:

The House Committee on Education and Labor is now holding hearings on a five-year extension of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. The Senate Labor and Public Works Committee is planning to hold hearings on the bill shortly.

Many members of Congress have introduced H.R. 112 (identical with H.R. 3049) which would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a tax credit for employers who employ members of the hard-core unemployed. The bill was referred to Ways and Means; no hearings have been scheduled.

Another bill, the Full Opportunity Act (H.R. 3338), would expand employment opportunities and establish a universal minimum wage of $2 an hour. It would also give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission authority to pursue action against discriminatory practices. This bill was referred to the House Education and Labor Committee; no hearings have been scheduled.

Several bills have been referred to the House Select Subcommittee on Labor which would guarantee productive employment opportunities for those who are unemployed or underemployed. The bill would authorize $4 billion to permit the Secretary of Labor to make grants to government agencies or nonprofit organizations for employing up to one million eligible unemployed persons at any one time.

A bill to amend a section of the National Labor Relations Act (H.R. 100) would permit peaceful picketing at construction sites by unions in the construction and building trades. This bill will receive hearings before the House Education and Labor Committee shortly after the recess.

Other bills introduced in the Senate and the House would extend coverage under the National Labor Relations Act to agriculture workers. Hearings have not been scheduled yet.

Administration Action:

The President sent a message to Congress asking for a one-year extension of appropriations for the Office of Economic Opportunity which expires June 30, 1969.

UAW WORKERS GAIN when America decides to improve mass transit system. Here Philadelphia Budd workers put finishing touches on New York to Washington high-speed trains now going non-stop in 2½ hours time.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

Congressional Action:

Over 75 bills have been introduced in Congress thus far on law enforcement (approximately 20 were referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, four to the Senate District Committee, 50 to the House Judiciary Committee and five to the House District Committee).

Several subcommittees have held hearings on proposals to amend the Bail Reform Act of 1966, including provisions to detain defendants viewed as likely to commit further offenses while awaiting trial, and measures to improve juvenile institutions and prisons and combat organized crime and crime in Washington, D.C. and its suburbs.

Other law enforcement proposals introduced in the House and Senate and awaiting hearings include: salary supplements and increased benefits for police and judicial officers; educational grants and salary incentives for police officers who pursue further education; grants for improving correctional institutions and rehabilitation programs; and measures to improve the D.C. court system.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent Congress any messages or proposals dealing with law enforcement. The only significant action to date was a public statement on January 31, in which the President made several suggestions for improving law enforcement in Washington, D.C. only.

TAXATION AND ECONOMIC POLICY

Congressional Action:

Several comprehensive tax reform bills have been introduced in the House. The Ways and Means Committee is currently holding hearings on limited tax reform. (The last major overhaul of the Internal Revenue Code took place in 1954.) The Committee has already heard witnesses on the subjects of tax-exempt foundations and tax treatment of state and municipal bonds. Additionally, the Committee will examine questions of charitable contributions, farm losses, capital gains provisions, accelerated depreciation allowances, the 7% investment tax credit, estate and gift taxes, and tax rules applying to stock-option plans. It will also examine the regular standard deduction, minimum and maximum taxes, the gasoline tax and the single persons' tax.

A bill increasing the public debt limit passed the House by a vote of 313-92 and the Senate by a vote of 67-18. The bill increased the permanent debt ceiling by $7 billion from $485 billion to $365 billion) and the temporary ceiling by $12 billion (from $365 billion to $377 billion). The new temporary ceiling would apply through June 30, 1970. The bill passed by Congress reflects a cut of $17 billion in the amount of new borrowing authority requested by President Nixon.

Administration Action:

The Administration has indicated it will not submit a tax reform proposal this year.

The President has, however, asked Congress to extend the 10% income tax surcharge for another year. He also asked that excise taxes be kept at their present level.

The President also asked Congress to increase the debt limit.

TRANSPORTATION

Congressional Action:

About 20 bills on highway transportation have been referred to the House Public Works Committee. One would permit a state to use funds from the Highway Trust Fund for purposes of urban mass transportation.

Two bills on airplane transportation have been referred to the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. H.R. 3668 would provide additional federal assistance in connection with the construction, alteration or improvement of airports and related facilities. H.R. 15 would provide for the development and construction of a commercial supersonic transport airplane.

No hearings have been held on any of these measures to date.

Administration Action:

The President has sent no messages or proposals to Congress regarding transportation.

WELFARE

Congressional Action:

Many bills have been introduced to repeal the statutory provisions limiting the number of children to whom federal payments may be made under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program. Also pending are related bills which would establish minimum national welfare eligibility standards.

Bills have also been introduced involving guaranteed income proposals for people who need public assistance. An income maintenance bill (H.R. 586) was referred to the Ways and Means Committee while family allowance proposals have been referred to the House Education and Labor Committee. Hearings have not been held on these measures.

Administration Action:

The President has not sent any programs or messages to Congress regarding welfare.

—Report prepared by the Democratic Study Group of the U.S. House of Representatives, April 1, 1969

WEEKEND WRAPUP

That DSG study on what Nixon and Congress haven't done tells a lot about Washington during the past three months. Nixon has moved extremely cautiously, almost as though he was afraid to do anything. As the liberal caucus of the House of Representative, the DSG (Democratic Study Group) now numbers some 100 members out of a total 244 Democrats. The DSG is providing more and more of the political ignition for Congress on the House side. Little seems to happen at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, where new programs, new ideas, new thrusts usually occur. So Congress with strong shoves from the DSG must take the bull by the horn. . . . Take education, for example. Here the Johnson administration really shined. And thanks to Chairman Carl Perkins of the House Education and Labor Committee, Congress is cranking up a $5 billion program five-year extension of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA). The Nixon people are getting a bit jittery about the lack of any movement, so after Easter we can expect some signs of activity from the executive branch of government. Republican leaders want only a one-year extension on the education bill, but Democrats are going to demand five years without any serious tampering of the bill as it comes out of committee. Two Republican moderates—Bell of California and Reid of New York—support the bill scheduled for floor action soon. Federal billions for education keeps local property taxes down. . . . The upset congressional election in Wisconsin last week was a sign that congressional Republicans could be in deep trouble by 1970. Democrats put up a strong candidate, gave him enough money to run a strong campaign, and then buried the hatchet among themselves to carry the huge, predominately rural and small town district. David Obey, the 30 year old winner, ran against Republican mismanagement of state finances and against the multi-billion dollar ABM. Obey's victory is a blow to Nixon and to Defense Secretary Laird, whose seat he captured and whose defense policies the voters repudiated. . . . Tom Bradley's huge vote in Los Angeles was a refreshing sign that racial moderation is on the upswing on the West Coast in the race for LA mayor. With powerful labor and Democratic support, Bradley now has support from The Los Angeles Times and Congressman Alphonzo Bell, the moderate Republican who was eclipsed in the primary. . . . Detroit's Congresswoman Martha Griffiths is a key member of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, which writes the tax laws of this country. Mrs. Griffiths shook a lot of her colleagues last week when she called for the defeat of 25 or so congressmen if Congress fails to approve tax reform this year. Almost everybody is for tax reform these days—with one fascinating exception. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, bless their tax-deducting souls, is against tax reform. Their members love, not merely like, those loopholes and they don't want Congress to do anything. Oil depletion, capital gains, accelerated depreciation of real estate, interest on state and municipal bonds, hobby farm losses, and charitable contributions—the whole bit. The Chamber wants those loopholes to stay just the same. All you workers getting your paychecks clipped by Uncle Sam's payroll withholding every payday, don't you fret. What is good for the Chamber of Commerce, the Chamber says, is good for the United States. . . . The professional rightwingers are in a constant state of apoplexy these days, never sure when Mr. Nixon will throw a bone or two to the Democrats. But one thing sure to send many Birchers and Liberty Lobby types into orbit is last week's 7 to 1 Supreme Court decision which puts the high court's approval on union production quotas. The real issue is the Court's recognition that a democratic union has the right to bargain for a contract, and when that contract is agreed upon, it must be lived up to. Union critics love to castigate union leaders for not calling off wildcat strikes and living up to a union contract. The same critics will probably howl because the Supreme Court last week ruled that a UAW contract calling for production quotas ought to be lived up to, too. . . . The death and final memorials to President Eisenhower put this man's life in some perspective of greatness. Eisenhower was a rare military man who thought like a civilian. Increasing numbers of Americans are today questioning military advice. This same skepticism ran through Ike. In many ways Ike was a weak President. He let the country drift dangerously into neglect of its schools, its resources, its cities. With his enormous popularity (it was nearly impossible to dislike him), he could have been a conservative dictator who might have sent this country back to the days of child labor.

"Q: Would the $5 billion antimissile system recently announced by Secretary McNamara fall into the President's category of 'excessive arms?' "

"I wasn't prepared for his vivid response. Five billion! That was only the beginning, the President said impatiently. It would buy a pilot establishment, nothing else. And then we would have to go on and on until we had 'the works.' He drew a spiral in the air with his forefinger as he talked. You'd get up into the $20 billions, then the $30 billions, and the $40 billions—just for the United States. Every little town and locality would insist on have a shield. Even Gettysburg. And soon, too, all your allies will insist on having it . . . Now, mind you, the President said, I wouldn't call it a form of excessive arms if I thought it would be effective." [Emphsis in original]

Congress questions priorities

DIRKSEN AND MUNDT, (left), two Senate conservatives will likely block any attempts to reorder U.S. priorities. Growing Democratic and Republican demands may blunt their opposition.

Mr. Nixon has moved the country slightly off dead center. The impasse between Congress and the White House is beginning to break up.

A modest 10 point program with a little bit of everything for everybody finally got sent to Capitol Hill by the Nixon administration. It calls for tax-sharing and tax credits (real Republican doctrine); and some tinkering with Social Security, manpower programs, a heavier crackdown on crime, tax reform, updating of our transportation system, and streamlining the Post Office (sure to woo a perplexed public with no political axes to grind).

Meanwhile, the U.S. economy shows no signs of slowing down, nor does inflation seem in any hurry to ease off. Personal income and business expansion soared last month. The U.S. gross national product is now roaring along at the rate of $900 billion a year.

Liberal Democrats in the House won a party caucus battle to work for an end to the inflation-breeding 7 percent investment credit, which costs the U.S. Treasury $3 billion a year. And the pressures for tax reform seem to grow. Everybody except the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is for it.

Congress is unhappy about Nixon intentions to close down Job Corps camps. Hearings are underway this week to spotlight the gains and losses of this venture in rescuing kids from poverty and hopelessness.

The country continues to question topheavy defense spending in both Johnson and Nixon budgets. There is an increasing clamor for beefing up domestic programs to educate the young, care for the elderly, and clean up our cities. The voting habits of key members of the House Appropriations Committee given on page 3 of this issue makes it doubtful if Democratic leaders in the House can lead the fight for a reordering of national priorities. Traditionally, Senate liberals (both Democrats and Republicans) have rescued programs sent down the drain by House members with narrow and fixed ideas about where to spend the federal dollar.

The Senate Republican establishment led by Sen. Everett Dirksen shows no signs of changing its big handout policy for defense and parsimony for the wars against pollution, congestion, poverty, and ignorance.

A coalition of liberals and moderates from both parties in House and Senate may possibly provide enough muscle to subdue the conservative bigger military bang boys who tend to starve the cities when the Pentagon demands a new bomber, new missile or new weapons system.

Democratic tax reform bill would tax the rich, ease burden on wage earners

HARRIS

Sen. Fred R. Harris has introduced the Democratic Party's tax reform program, a package to shift about $4.5 billion of the tax burden from wage earners to corporations and the very rich.

The Oklahoma lawmaker, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, offered his plan a week before President Nixon was ready to unveil the Republican administration's tax reform proposals.

Harris proposed a "minimum" income tax which would close $1.2 billion worth of loopholes which he said permitted 21 millionaires to avoid income tax entirely and reduced the payments of many other wealthy individuals.

At the same time, the measure would provide a $1.1 billion tax cut for low income taxpayers, "relieving over one half of the 2.2 million poverty-level families from any tax liability."

The measure also suspends the 7 percent business investment credit, a $3.3 billion tax break for corporations which expand their plant and equipment.

The money saved by suspension of the credit would be used to reduce the 10 percent income surtax to 7 percent, Harris said.

The chart (right) shows precisely how Congress last cut the pie 51.6 percent for direct military expenditures and 66 percent military and defense related. Local property and state sales taxes would be helped if more federal money was pumped into education and welfare programs to the cities now facing a fiscal crisis of monumental proportions. GOP tax-sharing approaches would put money into the states without strings and cities gravely threatened might not get their fair share of help.

He said the program was in response to a national taxpayer's revolt which "reflects the anger of the average taxpayer who knows there are many who carry little or none of the burden."

Harris announced weeks ago that he would propose a

Tax reform will make rich pay more and give workers a breather. Democratic leaders ask for package that places burden on those best able to carry the load

"minimum" income tax plan. But he spelled out the details for the first time in a speech on the Senate floor.

The bill would tax at the regular rates at least one half of a taxpayer's total income regardless of the source. In determining total income, the measure would ignore present tax preferences for interest on state and municipal bonds, net long term capital gains, depletion allowances, accelerated depreciation on real property, appreciation on property given to charity and stock options.

"Thus, a taxpayer who has an actual income of $500,000 a year from totally exempt sources who has paid no tax in the past will now pay $160,000," he said.

"In the year 1967, 155 Americans with incomes of more than $200,000 paid no federal income tax, and of this group 21 earned more than a million dollars," he said.

"At the same time, 25 million citizens earning less than $3,000 annually paid $1.5 billion in federal income taxes," he added.

"Quite often, the result is that a man who earns over $1 million a year from real estate investment can avoid federal taxes completely while a married couple with an income of $2,200 must pay $84," he said.

Harris proposed a $1.1 billion tax break for wage earners in the low income brackets by increasing the minimum standard deduction for persons who do not itemize their expenses.

The measure would increase the minimum from the present $200 plus $100 for each member of a family to $600 plus $100 for each family member.

Harris' plan to eliminate the business investment credit and roll back the surtax from 10 to 7 percent parallels the proposal of Sen. John J. Williams, R-Del., a leader of the congressional economy bloc.

Both Harris and Williams said the investment credit, which pours money directly into the overheated capital goods market, is inflationary.

"It would seem fairer to grant some relief to the overburdened middle-income taxpayer by not asking for the full 10 percent surcharge extension, and, instead, cutting down also on the inflationary pressures of plant and equipment expenditures," Harris said.

Investment credit is fueling fires of inflation, according to Fred Harris. He calls for an end to this business bonanza

How 30 Democrats look and vote

The House of Representatives is jealous of its constitutional powers to appropriate money. As state and local governments seek federal help, the $160 billion or so Congress votes for everything from military hardware to Job Corps camps for poor white and black boys who never had a fair chance in life becomes a matter of life and death to the life of all Americans. The federal purse strings have many handles—but none is more important than that of the 30 Democratic members of the House Appropriations Committee whose political pedigrees are described below.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Everything's going Mr. Nixon's way—but one thing bugs the hell out of partisan Republicans. It's Ted Kennedy. Everywhere Ted goes, he's followed by scores of TV cameras, reporters with notebooks, and wild acclaim from the natives. The flap up there in Alaska last week shows how jumpy some Republicans can get. There's a certain political magic about any Kennedy which attracts both press and the public—even in the remote reaches of Alaska. As Sen. Mansfield noted, the Republicans are making Ted Kennedy a candidate for 1972. Said Mansfield: "They (the Republicans) are pushing him (Kennedy) so far out in front that, if he wants it, it is a foregone conclusion he will get the nomination." Actually, Mr. Nixon is doing very well. Nixon has outraged a lot of hardcore rightwingers, but he did throw them a bone by putting Otto Otepka on the Subversive Activities Control Board. That's the rightwing boondoggle which spends thousands of dollars for shuffling papers around. Otepka is the darling of the people who see communists under every bed and he'd been in bureaucratic limbo during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations. . . . Have you sent your tea bag to Congress yet? A lot of people are doing that. It's a reminder of the Boston Tea Party mood of taxpayers these days. The Fred Harris tax reform package got the jump on Mr. Nixon, whose plan will go to Congress this week. The fate of the 7 percent investment credit is the thing to watch as Congress gets down to the nitty-gritty on tax reform. This is "business welfare." It's like throwing gasoline on the flames of inflation. The Democratic party caucus (a thing the Democratic Study Group wrung from Speaker McCormack this year for the first time), put the party on record against a continuation of the 7 percent investment credit. A $10 billion tax reform package could lift the 10 percent surtax next year for good. Elimination of the $3 billion investment credit loophole would permit cutting the surtax from 10 to 7 percent. . . . You didn't see it printed in any newspaper, but our UAW cheeks are blushing from the nice things Ralph Nader said about our UAW consumer program. He spoke, with Mr. Meany's ears wide open, to a session of the Unions for Scientific, Professional and Cultural Employees. Nader, incidentally, has about 30 of the brightest kids in the country coming to Washington this summer for another unvarnished look at the federal government. His appraisal of the Federal Trade Commission put the FTC into orbit, but it did shake up some of the encrusted ways of this agency and put the FTC on its mettle. . . . A lot of the superlatives in the Nixon legislative program were blurred by the decision to discontinue 59 of the 113 Job Corps centers around the country. The Nixon people lost a lot of points on that ploy—and there were some signs by the end of last week that the White House might change its mind about closing some centers. That old chestnut about it costing more to send a kid to Harvard than to a Job Corps center is still around. Fact is, of course, that kids ready for the social junkheaps until they get a second chance in the Job Corps will cost the taxpayers a lot more money if their talents are never developed or if they run afoul of the law. Sen. Ralph Yarborough has done a study which shows the federal government made money on the billions it spent on the GI Bill, which gave millions of American boys a chance to go to college or trade school. Their education repaid for itself many times over. The same is true of the Job Corps and if Nixon wipes out most of this program, he will be sending thousands of boys back to the same old dreary rut where they will cost society far more than the cost of a year or so in the Job Corps. . . . Tax-sharing is a tempting scheme which has both Republican and Democratic support—and now Mr. Nixon has made it part of his official program. The real flaw in tax-sharing is that state governments are chronically blind to the needs of cities, where the biggest headaches are in education and welfare. Giving states a big hunk of federal dollars won't help the American taxpayer nor cure the problems. . . . The shades of monolithic communism seem to be drawing shut on the brief period of free socialism that thrived under Alexander Dubcek. The Czechs deeply resent the ragged edge to life their economic ties to Russia have caused them. Like all people, they yearn for a chance to say out loud what they feel inside. It will be a tragedy for America if history proves we stood by and allowed the Czech reformists to go under—all because of an eagerness for rapprochement with Russia. . . . The turmoil on many college campuses baffles a lot of white workers who never got beyond high school. Kids with long hair and blank checks from Daddy go on the rampage. The worker pulls that lever or lifts that steel and never seems to get ahead. Pete Hamill says "the working class white man is actually in revolt against taxes, joyless work, the double standard and short memories of professional politicians, hypocrisy and what he considers the debasement of the American dream." A lot of these mostly union members feel forgotten in these days of student strikes and black militancy. Nothing will unify Americans more than even-handed tax reform of taxes that bear down hardest on the man or woman who punches a timeclock and gets clipped every time he cashes his paycheck. Workers resent the kind of grubby life which surrounds them—the urban sprawl, the smog, the jerry-built houses. A massive national undertaking to improve the quality of life for all people would also heal the wounds that divide us all.

FCC will order stiff warnings on cig ads if Congress falters

The Federal Trade Commission will require a stiffer health warning in all cigarette advertising and on packages unless Congress again acts to prevent it, Chairman Paul Rand Dixon said.

"There is a preeminent need for a health warning in cigarette advertising,"Dixon said, because "it is dispensed without regard to the youthfulness of its audience."

The FTC chairman said the new health warning contemplated by the FTC would be similar to the one it attempted to put into effect in 1965 when Congress intervened and established the milder warning now required only on cigarette packages.

The FTC proposal read: "Caution: Cigarette smoking is dangerous to your health and may cause death from cancer and other diseases."

The present cigarette package warning reads: "Caution: Cigarette smoking may be hazardous to your health."

Dixon, who disclosed the commission's intention to the House Commerce Committee conceded that requiring the warning in all advertising including radio and television commercials would probably bring an end to broadcast cigarette advertising.

"I doubt very seriously if they (the tobacco industry) were required to present prominent warning they would want to spend the money that way," Dixon said.

Dixon said his agency would make its move "on or shortly after July 1" if Congress does not preclude it.

The FTC chairman said the agency also favored requiring a statement of the average tar and nicotine content of cigarettes in labeling and advertising.

"We have found that widespread publicity of accurate tar and nicotine yield figures does result in the purchase of lower yield, less hazardous brands," Dixon said.

The FTC supports the FCC's proposal to ban broadcast commercials but he himself was opposed to it, Dixon said. He based his objection on the possibility a safer cigarette might be developed "and there would be no way to advertise them."

A spokesman for the American Heart Association testified that although "no specific causal relationship" between smoking and heart disease has been clinically proved, the statistical case "is growing steadily more convincing."

The witness was Dr. Lewis E. January, professor of medicine at the University of Iowa and a past association president. He was accompanied by Dr. Campbell Moses, of New York, the association's medical director.

"After years of probing and questioning, we are particularly impressed that no one has been able to deny the keystone of the anti-cigarette case—the fact that the overall death rate for men who smoke cigarettes is nearly twice as high as for men who never smoked cigarettes," he said.

Rep. Richardson Preyer, D-N.C., asked if it wasn't true that a two pack a day smoker is also likely to drink a lot of coffee and alcoholic beverages, to change jobs more often than the non-smoker and to change wives more often.

"Changing wives, high tension personalities — these things aren't easy to change," replied Moses. "You can quit smoking."

Rep. Tim Lee Carter, R-Ky., a medical doctor, asked whether the association would be "willing to label pork products dangerous or hazardous to health" because saturated fats and cholesterol are associated with heart disease.

"I would be willing to see it labeled as to cholesterol content," January said. He explained later that this would make it easier for patients on a low cholesterol diet to stop.

Lung cancer kills thousands each year and Americans are demanding tougher safeguards against dishonest advertising by tobacco companies which equate smoking with clean air, sunshine, and the wide open spaces. The Federal Trade Commission is cranking up tougher rules, if Congress fails to act.

Business lobby thwarts safety legislation

"The letters were neatly typed on fancy corporation stationery—and they did the trick, they killed the safety bill in the last Congress."

That's what a legislative aide to a top congressional leader said of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, which died a painful death in the last Congress, and shows only feeble signs of coming to life again.

Mine safety has been pushed to the forefront as a result of several serious mine disasters and by the pressure of thousands of West Virginia coal miners converging on their state capital to demand tougher laws to protect miners from black lung, the deadly disease which afflicts at least 100,000 active and retired American coal miners.

The brutal facts of industrial safety have been spelled out time and again by leading officials of the Department of Labor and are repeated elsewhere on these pages. A tragic reversal of a safety ruling by the new Secretary of Labor during the opening days of the Nixon administration has doomed thousands of uranium miners to an early death. The UAW and other unions worked mightily to raise safety standards for these miners, but industry pressures put a freeze order on the effective date of the new rules.

The real dangers in modern industry go beyond the mutilation of limbs and the sudden deaths from accidents. As Ralph Nader has pointed out in several articles, the whole chemical muck that workers live and work in is the deeper danger. Industry has been slow to deal with this encroachment. Many unions have been lax in dealing with the environmental turbulence which deals death and injury to countless millions in all walks of life.

Moves by several lawmakers, Richard Ottinger and Richard McCarthy, both of New York, to establish "ecological ombudsmen" are steps in the direction of real help to the worker exposed to dangerous chemicals on his job. This weighty phrase—"ecological ombudsmen"—simply means that somebody with authority to investigate the hazards to human health caused by the mindless unleashing of dangerous substances, and with authority to take corrective actions.

The future for the occupational safety bill hinges on the initiative of members of Congress, plus the Department of Labor, and the determination of union members and their organizations to demand action.

Lloyd Utter, the safety director of the UAW, notes that 1.7 million industrial workers suffer from impaired or lost hearing resulting from industrial noise. Labor Today reports: "No government data tells the story of the millions who suffer from nervous tension, mental illness and fatigue brought on by killing speedup and anxiety over job security. Or of those who suffer from alcoholism, seeking escape from anxiety."

Industry apologists for state approaches to safety believe that slogans and word-of-mouth campaigns can make the job safe for workers. They fail to realize that the weight

"While the nation is concerned about street crime, it virtually ignores the far greater death, injury and wage losses on farms, in mines, factories and at construction sites. Since 1965 civil disorders have caused 260 deaths; but unsafe and unhealthy working conditions claim approximately 275 lives each week."—RALPH NADER

STATE AND INDUSTRIAL SAFETY STANDARDS are next to worthless. A tough federal law will save the lives of many on the industrial death list—but the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and National Association of Manufacturers are waging a loud and fraudulent lobby against federal safety standards and enforcement. It costs money, and many businesses would rather save money than save human lives.

"The chief forms of domestic violence that afflict American working men and women are motor vehicle crashes and occupational accidents and diseases. The toll in death and injury from either of these utterly dwarfs the violence committed in street crimes. But while the nation is properly concerned about such crime, it ignores almost completely the far greater death, injury and wage losses on farms, in mines, factories and open-work areas such as construction sites.

"Consider one comparison out of many that could be cited: all the urban riots in this country during the past three years have led to about 260 dead; each working day brings death to fifty-five workers, disabling injury to 8,500 and lesser injury to 27,200. Every year, 14,000 to 15,000 workers die, more than half a million are disabled by occupational diseases, more than 2 million are disabled by occupational accidents, and more than 7 million are injured.

"And even these figures understate the situation, because death from prolonged exposure to toxic chemicals or particulate matter—asbestos, beryllium, carbon monoxide, coal dust, cotton dust, cancer-causing chemicals, dyes, pesticides, radiation, etc.—is rarely recorded. There are six reasons why the death and injury figures fall short of the facts—reasons which must be recognized publicly before significant progress can be made to reduce worker injury and disease." RALPH NADER.

MINERS ARE MURDERED by coal mine disasters, but little is done to prevent them. Living death from "black lung" afflicts some 100,000 miners today. Their tragedy underscores the deeper tragedy of all industrial workers who risk their lives earning their bread at unsafe machines in hazardous circumstances

"Today we spend $95 on auto safety research for each traffic fatality that occurs in the United States, $95 for each death caused by heart disease, $415 on cancer research for each cancer death, and $6.57 on occupational safety research for every worker killed on the job.

"Are occupational accidents the necessary price of progress? Must 14,000 to 15,000 Americans die every year as a sacrifice to the theory of "inevitability"?

"The record shows that where we have tried, we have succeeded. Sound safety programs in progressive companies have reduced deaths and injuries as much as 90 percent. States which mount effective safety programs have lower death rates than those that don't."

—ESTHER PETERSON, former Assistant Secretary of Labor under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson

"Every working day 55 workers die, 8,500 are disabled and 27,200 are injured (a case can be made that these data are undernumerated by at least 25 percent annually).

"Unlike traumatic injuries which are relatively visible, the longer range injuries causing insidious deterioration of the human body come from exposure to coal dust, asbestos, lead cadmium, beryllium, cotton dust, carbon monoxide, chemicals, dyes, radiation, pesticides, benzene and thousands of other toxic materials. Industrial uses of chemicals are growing so rapidly that voluntary exposure limits have been set for only 400 of the 6,000 chemicals in substantial use."—RALPH NADER

Here we go again—the southern Democratic-Republican coalition is back in business. They gutted the school bill last week. Not beyond repair. With a little luck, the Senate may patch things up—but there's a lot of damage done, and the conservative coalition did it. Nine brave and true Republicans and 32 southern Democrats plus 143 northern Democrats (a total of 184 votes)—that's all the liberals and moderates could muster to hold the line against attacks on the school bill. School districts sent legions of hardpressed school officials down to Washington. They lobbied their best. But the gut vote of 235 to 184 on the Green amedment was the result, the first real liberal-conservative test in this new 91st Congress. It was a margin of 51 votes and 26 votes needed switching to change the outcome. That's the story of this new Congress. . . The Job Corps is finding it has more friends than its well-publicized bloopers would have you believe. Congress may yet get the Nixon administration to back down its decision to shut the doors on many of the centers—but that's a pretty iffy proposition at this stage. We'll have a fuller report next week. . . . The anti-ABM group in the Senate is bounding ahead, picking up support all the time, despite the heavy Nixon administration pressures. UPI estimates that 49 U.S. Senators are against the ABM deployment while 42 are for it. There is much rank-and-file consternation about the ABM (a current bumpersticker reads: "The ABM Is An Edsel"), but there's not a peep against the ABM from the AFL-CIO. . . . "As long as the chairman of the committee believes it is socialism to feed hungry children, but it is perfectly commendable to give large subsidies to farmers, as long as this state of mind prevades the leadership of the committee, I don't think we can hope that the poor and the sick and the hungry will be properly fed. So spoke Dr. Jean Mayer, a Harvard nutritionist, last week in denouncing the chairman of the House agriculture committee for the slipshod way Chairman Poage of Texas has handled the hunger problem before his committee. . . . And here's another scary quote to tuck away in your ecology basket: "The new technological man carries stronium-90 in his bones, iodine-131 in his thyroid, DDT in his fat, asbestos in his lungs." That's Barry Commoner speaking, who told Sen. Muskie's subcommittee on environment that our technology, while magnificently productive is seriously flawed because it is consuming the natural capital of mankind—namely, the environment and the people who live in it—at such a rapid rate that it threatens probably within the next 50 years to destroy it irreparably. . . . Michigan's Congressman Jim O'Hara will get lots of halleluyahs from consumers (that's all of us) for his "truth in warranty" bill. The O'Hara bill would require manufacturers to repair and replace faculty merchandise quickly at no cost to the buyer. Says O'Hara: "Too many Americans have learned through bitter experience that their warranties do not cover the full cost of necessary repair, do not provide prompt servicing, and have not insured repair work of high professional quality." . . . Washington's Chuck Stone appeared on the NBC "Today Show" last week with a list of 7 grievances black Americans have against the Nixon administration. Somebody was listening and a lot of ears were burning. Before he left the studio, three agencies had called for transcripts. Time estimates 7 million watch the "Today Show.". . . California's Jim Corman, who served on the Kerner commission, says the Job Corps and other direct federal programs are better than the Nixon tax credit route in dealing with hardcore poverty. He thinks "there is the danger that business will only desire to take those workers who can be most easily trained, and will leave behind those who lack basic education. It would result in maximum cost with minimum return."

"BY THE WAY, WHAT ARE WE DEVELOPING TO PROTECT OUR CITIES?"

SAFETY

of strong federal law oftentimes compels a company to make jobs safer.

Industry tends to take the same approach to job safety that the auto industry long took toward highway safety, believing that signs and warnings are more important than the design engineering for safety of the vehicle itself.

Many states have more fish and game wardens than safety inspectors, thus the state approach to safety is nearly worthless. States simply do not put the same pressures on the wayward that the federal government does. Workers lose their lives or limbs as a result.

Chamber of Commerce and NAM mail against federal safety laws last year undoubtedly saved industry lots of money. It also meant the loss of life to thousands of industrial workers killed in preventable accidents.

Every minute we talk, Secretary of Labor Wirtz told a House subcommittee last year, 18 to 20 people will be severely enough hurt to have to leave their jobs—some of them never to return.

Wirtz noted that state safety expenditures are very small, some agencies lack any rule-making authority, and standards at the state level are outdated. Manpower is scare to enforce what little safety standards there are, penalties are too lenient, and coverage is very limited.

It's a bad situation and the Chamber and NAM are doing nothing to improve the situation on the state level.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION QUICKENS ON THREE VITAL BILLS

Legislation in three areas of great concern to the Leadership Conference - civil rights, anti-poverty and education - has been getting increased attention from Congress in the past few weeks. This MEMO reports on where the main bills are now, where they are heading and what Leadership Conference organizations can do to help get good legislation enacted in these fields.

NEW OMNIBUS CIVIL RIGHTS LAW INTRODUCED

Last week, Senator Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.) and a bipartisan group of 33 other Senators introduced the "Omnibus Civil Rights Act of 1969" (S. 2029). The four titles of the bill are aimed at correcting glaring inadequacies and injustices in civil rights laws already enacted. On the House side, Rep. Emanuel Celler (D., N.Y.) has scheduled hearings on voting rights legislation to start May 14 before the House Judiciary Committee.

Title I - would attempt to extend to the selection of state and local juries the prohibitions against discrimination based on race, creed, color, sex, national origin or economic status; the 90th Congress enacted such prohibitions last year in regard to Federal juries.

Title II - would give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the authority most other Federal administrative agencies have, to issue cease-and-desist orders enforceable in the courts.

Title III - would lift the freeze on the U. S. Civil Rights Commission's annual authorization. In extending the life of the Commission five years to June 30, 1973, the last session of Congress adopted an amendment limiting the agency's yearly authorization to what it received in 1968, namely $2,650,000. The freeze is really a cut, since pay raises and other increased expenses will sorely tax the Commission's budget.

Title IV - would amend the Voting Rights Act of 1965 by extending for five more years the prohibition on discriminatory use of literacy tests and other voter qualifying devices. That prohibition is scheduled to expire on July 1, 1970. According to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission's figures, 1,280,000 Negroes registered to vote in 11 Southern states between the passage of the Act in 1965 and the spring of 1968. It is generally agreed that nearly 400 Negroes were elected to public office as a result of the Act. Its extension is crucial to any furtherance of equality through the ballot.

LCCR Studying Provisions

In 1968 the Leadership Conference supported all of these provisions. It will support them in principle again but its lawyers are considering means of strengthening them.

The EEOC title is under particular scrutiny. Here the Administration's views are as important as those of the Conference if we are to build support for this legislation.

Conference representatives have already met with U. S. Attorney John Mitchell, Jerris Leonard, Assistant U. S. Attorney General for Civil Rights and Secretary of Labor, George P. Shultz. It appears likely that they will back some form of cease-and-desist powers for EEOC. Leadership Conference lawyers will continue to press for the best possible enforcement powers.

What Conference Groups Can Do

Your organization can help support a strong civil rights bill by letting the Attorney General and the President know it wants civil rights legislation that: prohibits discrimination in the selection of state and local trial juries; lifts the freeze on the Civil Rights Commission's authorization; extends the protections of the Voting Rights Act for five more years and gives EEOC authority to issue the strongest possible cease-and-desist orders.

A KEY EDUCATION BILL MOVES TO THE SENATE

The bill to extend aid to public schools through the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (H.R. 514) will shortly come before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee after suffering a setback in the House.

On Wednesday, April 23, a coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats rejected the leadership bill, which would have extended the act virtually unchanged for five more years, and adopted instead, a substitute that extends the law for only two years and makes some fundamental changes in it.

Among other things, the so-called Green-Quie substitute, named after Rep. Edith Green (D., Ore.) and Albert Quie (R., Minn.) its chief sponsors, would:

(1) consolidate four state educational programs into one block grant - Title II, ESEA (library resources); Title III, ESEA (supplementary education centers); Title III, National Defense Education Act (equipment); and Title V-A, NDEA (guidance, counseling and testing).

(2) permit local boards to give a salary bonus - "combat pay" Mrs. Green calls it - to teachers in disadvantaged areas.

Anti-Civil Rights Amendments Beaten

The one bright spot in the ESEA debate was the ease with which two anti-civil rights amendments were beaten. The two similar amendments, offered separately by Rep. James M. Collins (D., Texas) and Rep. J. J. Pickle (D., Texas) were purportedly aimed at prohibiting the busing of school children. Actually they would have struck another blow at Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and helped school districts reestablish racial segregation. Both amendments were soundly rejected on voice votes. Mr. Quie and Rep. James O'Hara (D., Mich.) led the bipartisan opposition to these proposals.

What Conference Groups Can Do

The fight against block grants and any anti-civil rights riders and for a longer extension of ESEA will resume when the bill comes before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. Hearings have not been scheduled yet but Conference groups can start writing to Senators now, urging them to keep the Elementary and Secondary Education Act intact and to extend it for at least three years.

A separate fight will have to be waged to get full funding for the Federal education programs.

ANTI-POVERTY HEARINGS MOVE TO A CLIMAX

The vote on the ESEA bill raises grave doubts about the possibility of getting the Economic Opportunity Act (H.R. 513) extended for five years. Rep. Carl Perkins (D., Ky.) Chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, has already indicated he will settle for a three-year extension. The Administration wants the Act extended for only one year.

OEO In Danger

An even graver issue is the fate of the Office of Economic Opportunity. In the five years of its existence, OEO has clearly demonstrated its great value as the developer of programs that can help end poverty in America. Head Start, Upward Bound, Legal Services, Neighborhood Youth Corps, Comprehensive Health Services, 1,000 Community Action Agencies are programs that have demonstrated their worth in the war on poverty. They bring hope to the hopeless. The Administration's proposal to close 59 Job Corps Centers and deny the promise of this program to some 13,000 youngsters is an ominous harbinger of what may come.

What Conference Groups Can Do

The hearings before the House Labor Committee are almost over. A public mark-up of the bill is scheduled to start May 13. A Senate Labor and Public Welfare Subcommittee is beginning hearings on anti-poverty legislation. Conference groups can help in several ways: by having their Washington representatives attend the mark-up sessions (a large attendance is one way to demonstrate interest in a piece of legislation); by issuing statements, and resolutions and by writing to all House members urging them to extend the Economic Opportunity Act for as long a period as possible; to keep OEO an independent agency; to increase authorizations and appropriations to levels high enough to keep the programs fully operative; and to oppose any attempt to weaken, cut back or destroy the landmark OEO programs.

KEY ROLLCALL VOTE ON EDUCATION BILL

The House on 4/23 adopted an amendment to the aid to education bill, cutting the program back from 5 to 2 years and giving the states direct control over part of the federal funds.

The amendment was passed, 235-184. Right votes against the amendment were cast by 175 Democrats and 9 Republicans. Wrong votes for the amendment were cast by a coalition of 175 Republicans and 60 Democrats.

Women Having Work Problems

BY SARALEE TIEDE
Chronicle Reporter

About 55 percent of local Women Job Corps returnees have jobs in uskilled areas unrelated to their Job Corps training.

Many of the others are unemployed, according to a report on the Job Corps Returnee Center at the Downtown Branch of the Young Women's Christian Assn.

59 Now Enrolled

In the first year of operation, the center has attempted to contact 250 Job Corps returnees here, said Mrs. Paul Titus, chairman of the center's advisory committee.

At present, 59 are enrolled in center activities, which include tutoring, job-finding, social and recreational activities, goodgrooming and counseling.

The girls were recruited from 190 graduates and 74 others who returned before completing the course.

The girls came from families with an average income of $67 weekly. About 50 percent of them are high school dropouts. Mrs. Titus said.

The YWCA center, financed by the Moody Foundation, Farish Foundation, and Hogg Foundation for Mental Health and private donations, was formed to pick up where the Job Corps left off, Mrs. Titus said.

"Realistically, the Job Corps cannot fill the gaps and deprivations of 17 years of poverty in one year."

Major Need Cited

The centers' staff, headed by Miss Joanne Rhone, says the girls major need is help in finding jobs. Most of the girls must contribute money to their family's support and 37 of them have children of their own, Mrs. Titus said.

The center has located jobs for five girls and placed four in training positions.

However, the main purpose of the program was not job-finding, but helping the girls meet problems which imprison them in poverty, Mrs. Titus said. The YWCA offers classes leading to an equivalency diploma and preparation for the licensed vocational nurse entrance exam, involving 40 girls.

Another 27 have participated in visits to colleges and five have already entered college as a result.

The YWCA now hopes to involve volunteers as "big sisters" to the returnees. The volunteers would help provide transportation and be a mature friend to the girl, Mrs. Titus said.

The center also needs more money to continue its work, she added.

Fight to Retain Job Corps Center

By George Davis
Washington Post Staff Writer

Larry Ellis, 21, quit high school in his junior year. He was 16, and he started "running wild," he said, living at various places in the upper Cardozo area—sometimes with his father and sometimes with parents of friends.

He worked at more than a dozen jobs. None of them paid more than about $1.50 per hour.

Raymond Holloway, 18, was in a residential Job Corps center in New Jersey until it was closed in April last year. He came to Washington on his own to enroll in the Job Corps Community Center here.

Frank Lloyd, 18, dropped out of high school in the 10th grade because he said he wasn't learning anything. Three weeks ago, after one year in the Job Corps Community Center, he passed his high school equivalency exam.

The three are leaders in a fight by more than 100 enrollees to keep the center at 1402 Otis pl. nw. open despite Federal plans to close it.

"The center means a lot to us," said Ellis, "We're not going to be turned out like animals.

"When we were out there in the streets they called us crooks and hoodlums, and now that we have a chance to get an education they're talking about closing it, but we'll fight until the end. We're not going to leave."

The enrollees plan to fight on a local level an Administration decision announced last February to close 55 of the Nation's 110 Job Corps Centers by June 30.

The Washington center was scheduled to close May 30, but on Wednesday 45 corpsmen picketed the Office of Economic Opportunity's headquarters in support of center director Maurice Wells, who was inside trying to get funding for one more month.

"We hope we can pick up another sponsor in a month," Wells said yesterday.

Officials at OEO agreed to fund the project until June 30.

The Job Corps Community Center opened in September, 1967, as the only non-residential coeducational center in the Nation. Its purpose was to give high school level courses to dropouts who were members of the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

Of more than 200 students who have enrolled at the center, 28 have passed the high school equivalency exam. Others still enrolled say the training has taught them how to present themselves for job interviews and how to conduct themselves on the job.

Enrollees take educational courses at the center for two or three hours a day, and spend the rest of the work day in on-the-job training at various Government agencies where they earn $1.60 per hour.

The center is located at the northern edge of the 14th Street poverty area that was burned out during last year's riot.

Model City Board Job Plan

A summer program for hiring 1000 youths in the St. Louis Model City neighborhood was approved last night by the Model City Agency board of directors. The program would cost $500,000.

Funds will be sought from the Federal Government in place of other programs previously submitted by the Model City Agency. The board is expected to decide later this week what other proposals will be affected.

If the program is approved, the youths, 16 to 22 years old, would work 18 hours a week in federal agencies with offices in the St. Louis area. They would be paid $1.60 an hour. Youths under 16 would be paid $1 an hour.

Goal of 15,000 Jobs

The jobs would be in addition to those being sought through the Mayor's Council on Youth Opportunity, which has set a goal of 15,000 jobs for the summer. A similar program last summer provided work for 10,200 youngsters. The program costs about $500 for each youth.

Approval of the special program means that other proposals totaling $500,000 will have to be cut from the Model City Agency's over-all request for funding. The request was submitted for the third time earlier this month. A total of $9,485,000 has been allocated for the St. Louis Model City area, but the entire amount is not expected to be appropriated.

A team of federal officials is to visit St. Louis May 26 for a final review of the agency's requests. Budget proposals and other aspects of the job program must be submitted to the Department of Housing and Urban Development at least a week before the team visits St. Louis.

Five Conditions

Members of the board, in approving the program, attached five conditions to ensure that the Model City Agency and its neighborhood corporations would retain control of all phases of the program. They disapproved of involvement of other agencies, such as the Human Development Corporation and the Missouri State Employment Service.

The conditions set out by the board were:

(1) That an agency be selected by the Federal Government and the Model City Agency to administer fiscal matters.

(2) That only youth of the Model City area be permitted to take part in the program. The youths would be selected by the neighborhood corporations.

(3) That the program would not affect the area's standing in other job programs.

(4) That the program be monitored under procedures to be established by the neighborhood corporations.

(5) That all supervisors, youth leaders, co-ordinators and clerical personnel be residents of the Model City area.

The Rev. Lucius Cervantes SJ, co-ordinator of the Mayor's Council on Youth Opportunity, had suggested that the Model City Agency undertake the program. He said it was expected that about 35 per cent of the agency's proposed programs would not be funded and urged that the summer employment program be offered as a substitute for programs deemed most likely not to gain approval.

Labor's role in the 1970's

The man who will lead this trade union into the 1970's, IAM President-elect Floyd E. Smith of Cleveland, Ohio, took part in a recent seminar at Berry College, Rome, Ga. The seminar was sponsored by the Federal Mediation Service. The subject of Smith's remarks was "The Role of Labor's Leadership in the 1970's."

The training of trade union leaders

There is no sharp and clear division between the membership and the leadership in the American labor movement. In unions, probably more than any other institution in our society, leadership is developed and drawn from the ranks of the membership.

There is no college degree that prepares one for a position of leadership in the American labor movement. For a union leader the process of education begins in the union hall and progresses through the trials and testings that come to him as a steward, local union officer, business agent, international representative and so on up the line—as far as his own talent and toughness may take him.

The quality of trade union membership

Today more than 25 per cent of the members of the Machinists Union are less than 30 years old. These young members have been reared in a period of unsurpassed prosperity. They may be no smarter than the union members of the '30s and '40s, but they are better educated. In the early '50s the average union member had only 10 years of formal education. Today he has 12.3 years. Five out of every eight union members have finished high school and one out of every five has completed college.

Few of these new young members understand the purpose and function—to say nothing of the necessity—of unions in a free enterprise economy. Many have been brainwashed by the anti-union attitudes of the big business press. Often even those who agree with labor's bargaining goals do not see any necessity for labor's legislative objectives.

This means, of course, that labor leadership in the 1970's will be increasingly concerned with programs of internal union education and communication. It means we are going to have to develop new and better ways to reach the minds and inspire support of union members at every level.

Unions for Government Employees

More than 12,000,000 people work for one kind of government or another in the United States today. Their jobs range from policeman to atomic scientist, from fireman to forest ranger, from garbage collector to librarian, from hospital worker to highway employee. Until recently most of these public employees were rather meek and unassuming. They have belonged to polite professional societies, like the National Education Association. And they have watched other groups of workers get ahead while their wages and working conditions lagged behind. . . .

Today unionism among public employees is growing and I expect this trend to gain momentum in the 1970's despite legislative efforts to discourage it.

Unions for farm workers

The 1970's will see union and union leaders playing an increasingly active role in the organization of farm workers. Nowhere is unionism more needed. Because of the myth of the family farm, the National Labor Relations Act specifically excluded farm labor from coverage. There was little basis for this myth in 1935. There is none today.

Farming in America is big business carried on by big, impersonal and often absentee-owned corporations. There are few ways in which unions could serve America better in the 1970's than by raising the wages, working conditions and living standards of migrant workers from coast to coast.

Black workers' need for unions

Today, the winds of change are battering down the barriers of discrimination and segregation that have stood between black Americans and equal opportunity. This is a process that cannot—and should not—be reversed. For millions of white Americans, the labor movement was the way out of poverty and the way into prosperity. Let us hope that it will be the same for black Americans.

It may not be easy to bring black Americans into the mainstream of the labor movement. Many have been totally alienated by past rejections. Some seek to destroy unions just as they seek to destroy universities, schools, churches, and other institutions in our society.

Fortunately, this is a minority. For every black who says "Burn, baby, burn," there are a hundred hard-working, wage-earning black families who say "Build, baby, build." And that is what they are doing. They are building unions in areas of this nation where we have never been able to establish a foothold before.

In the South—in Georgia, Alabama and other traditional anti-union states—they are applying the techniques of the Civil Rights struggle to the fight for collective bargaining.

Controlling the economy

For many workers, especially those in the newly organized groups, there will be a period of catching up at the bargaining table. How fast and how far these workers progress will depend largely on the level at which the overall economy is permitted to perform. This Administration is determined to "cool" the economy. If they are successful, they will inevitably increase unemployment. Economists advising the Administration say that this increased unemployment is not only controllable but, if it goes too far, reversible. I hope they know what they are talking about because unemployment and recessions haven't been so easily controlled in the past.

Dental care, mental illness

Some areas of bargaining have been pioneered in the 1960's such as dental and eye care plans will undoubtedly be expanded and improved by the 1970's. Most workers tend to neglect and defer dental care because other demands of the family budget always seem more urgent. I also expect that more contracts will be expanded in the 1970's to cover mental illness, especially when it is rooted in or aggravated by the tensions and pressures of today's industrial environments.

Medical care centers

Despite continuing improvement in company-paid health and welfare plans, rising costs of medical care have steadily eroded union gains at the bargaining table. I often hear the complaint that we negotiate higher incomes for doctors rather than improved medical care for union members. What we really need in thousands of communities from coast to coast are comprehensive medical care centers supported cooperatively by labor, management and local communities. In the 1970's we will seek more efficient and rational methods of delivering quality health care to the American people.

Success of collective bargaining

Because of collective bargaining America has the most successful system of labor relations in the world. Nowhere is the labor force more productive or, in fact, more committed to the free enterprise system. Despite all the exaggeration about the harmful effect of strikes only three-tenths of 1 per cent of all working time was lost last year because of strikes. Year after year less time is lost because of strikes than is lost because of on-the-job injuries or even coffee breaks.

Automation and new technology

Unlike the poor, miserable workers of the 19th century who went around smashing the machines that were destroying their jobs, labor will not try to stop automation in the 1970's. We know that as technology advances, living standards will also advance, at least in the long run. But we refuse to believe that individual workers should suffer—even in the short run—for technological advancements that benefit society in the long run.

Accordingly, I expect the 1970's to be a decade in which bargaining will increasingly aim for contract clauses protecting workers displaced by automation. More attention will be given, for example, to clauses providing severance pay, early retirement, retraining and relocation.

A Word Edgewise:

Democratic Party Reformers Overlooking Pertinent Issues

By John P. Roche

VARIOUS LEADERS — some elected, some self-appointed — are running around reorganizing the Democratic Party, apparently under the illusion that we lost the 1968 election because there was insufficient participation by the "forces of change."

Nobody has bothered to point out that the winners had far less "participatory democracy," that in fact 57 percent of the American electorate voted against the "forces of change." The latest Gallup Poll, showing Nixon at 62 percent, Wallace at 10, and Ted Kennedy at an appalling 33, suggests that the dispute on Democratic organization is simply irrelevant. It resembles nothing so much as an argument over what hymn to sing on the sinking Titanic.

For the benefit of those who are concerned with the real world, let us begin on square 1: there is only one way to win the presidency of the United States—by getting more votes than any other candidate. No matter how virtuous an individual may feel (and the followers of Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy have often acted as though they had a corner on political virtue), he has only one vote.

In well-organized dictatorships, the self-anointed children of light have the power to suppress the ignorant masses. They don't, thank God, have it here.

Whether he is happy about it or not, a political leader in the United States has to face the hard fact that the views of the American people establish the limits within which he must act. He can push these limits and, if he is trusted, the people will go a long way with him. But before he raises the banner of change, he has to establish himself by demonstrating that he thoroughly understands the basis of existing attitudes. He has to earn the right to be an innovator.

Right now the American people have a number of very deep grievances against the Democrats. The reaction of most Democratic spokesmen—which is to pretend that these problems do not exist—makes the situation worse.

All Pres. Nixon has to do is maintain his present policy of masterful inaction combined with effective rhetoric, and the refugees from the Democratic dream world could keep him in office until 1977.

Nothing generates distrust, and a rush to another line on the ballot, the way weasling does. On Viet Nam the leaders of the Democratic Party, since Lyndon Johnson abdicated, have put on a spectacular demonstration of this art. When it has been pointed out that the Tonkin Gulf Resolution went through the Senate with only two opposing votes, those who voted for it wax indignant and say "Johnson tricked us."

THIS CONFESSION of incompetence may bring big cheers from the young and militant, but the response of the average American is that if grown politicians can be duped that easily, they shouldn't run a dog pound, much less the country.

Reading the New York Times one might get the impression that we have turned into a nation of pacifists over the last three years. To believe this is to make a disastrous miscalculation; Americans are enraged about Viet Nam because they think that they have been double-crossed by their leaders. Thirty-four thousand Americans are dead and the party that launched the intervention refuses either to defend the decision (and I insist it is quite defensible) or to admit a massive collective error in underestimating the enemy.

The latter course is politically risky, but in the long run far less hazardous than conveying to the sovereign voters the image of the welsher. Right or wrong, Pres. Johnson never had that albatross hung around his neck.

Similarly on domestic disorder. The leaders of the Democratic Party go wandering around the country explaining why we have troubles. The population at large, however, is not working for a degree in sociology. It wants an answer to the perfectly legitimate question: what are you going to do about it? To ignore this question and its legitimacy is to invite the voter to go somewhere else for his answers.

I wish the top Democrats would worry a little less about "building bridges to Red China" or to the Soviet bloc, and start constructing a few to link them with the real concerns of the American people.

Surtax Extension Opposed Until Tied to 'Tax Justice'

Council Demands Action on Reform

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO "will not support any extension of the surtax until it is combined with immediate, substantial and equitable reform of the federal income tax structure," the federation's Executive Council declared here.

At its two-day spring meeting in Washington, the council strongly reaffirmed the AFL-CIO proposals for tax justice presented to Congress by Federation Pres. George Meany and said there is "no rational reason for lengthy delays. The time to bring the American standard of fair play into the tax structure is now."

The council moved also to throw its full support to four critical strikes and disputes across the nation—the hospital workers at Charleston, S.C., the state road workers in West Virginia, the continuing grape workers' struggle in California and the Oil Workers' Shell boycott.

It declared, in a statement on the ABM controversy, that Pres. Nixon should be supported as commander-in-chief in fulfilling his duty to determine the most effective way of meeting the nation's vital defense needs. (Story, Page 3.)

And it voiced its readiness to discuss "with any responsible authority" of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions "the restoration of free world labor unity" in terms of the reasons that led to the AFL-CIO's withdrawal. (Story, Page 2.)

The council accepted the decision of Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler to retire as of June 30, 1969, and elected Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to Meany, to fill out the term until the next convention in October 1969. (Story this page.)

It approved also a report by a council committee to propose to the next convention that the number of vice presidents and council members be expanded from 27 to 33. If the convention approves the change, six additional vice presidents will be elected in October.

In its tax statement, the council took note of Pres. Nixon's tax program, including extension of the 10 percent surtax beyond its June 30 termination date and other proposals for tax reform. It welcomed the President's recommendation for repeal of the 7 percent tax credit for business investment, but said "this one proposal does not satisfy the long overdue and critically urgent need for tax justice." (Text, Page 6.)

Ties Surtax Stand To Basic Reforms

Of the President's other proposals, the council said they "would not succeed in moving the tax structure very far toward tax justice" and that they fail to directly attack the "major loopholes which unconscionably reduce the tax burdens on the wealthy." The President's program, the council further pointed out, provides "no relief" for those of moderate and middle income, who bear the brunt of the tax burden."

Support for Strikers

In statements adopted on the four labor disputes the council:

- Affirmed its full support of the strike of hospital workers at Charleston, S.C., voted $25,000 to assist the strikers and called on all affiliated unions to contribute generously. (Story, Page 2.)
- Backed the strike of state road workers in West Virginia for recognition and good faith bargaining and voted $10,000 to help them in their struggle. (Story this page.)
- Renewed its call to all union members to make the struggle of the grape workers in California their own with complete support of the boycott against table grapes. (Story, Page 2.)
- Urged stepped-up help of the Shell boycott to aid the Oil Workers win fair and decent treatment from the company. (Story, Page 2.)

The council also received a report from Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists on the serious threat to carrier flight safety at National Airlines due to the lockout and firing of more than 1,000 union mechanics.

The report of the committee on the structure of the Executive Council declared that the federation, through membership on the council, "should be in a position to recognize new areas of real or potential growth and significance in the development of trade unionism, and to extend to a wider segment of the leadership of affiliated unions the opportunity for greater service to the membership of the labor movement at large."

The most practical way to accomplish this objective, it said, is to enlarge the council from 27 to 33 vice presidents.

At three press conferences during the two-day meeting Meany told reporters:

He has responded to a request from British Trades Union Congress leaders to discuss the situation informally with ICFTU leaders and others during the conference of the Intl. Labor Organization in June in Geneva. Meany and a number of council members will be attending the ILO conference.

The AFL-CIO can "under no circumstances" accept the proposals for farm workers' collective bargaining presented by Labor Sec. George Shultz to Congress on behalf of the Administration. Meany said he will spell out his objections in detailed testimony that he will present on May 16.

It is "a little too early" to pass judgment on the Nixon Administration overall, that it is proceeding cautiously, "maybe too cautiously" in some areas. The current meeting at the White House of the President with the entire Executive Council was a very good session, Meany said, as were the sessions of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee recently with leaders of the Administration on economic policy problems.

The federation's Economic Policy Committee is conducting an in-depth study of the Mexican border runaway plant problem along with other problems of the "export of American jobs."

Pres. Nixon's speech on Viet Nam was a very sober talk that presented the "facts squarely" and was pretty much the same fundamental position taken by Pres. Johnson.

Meany reported also that the council had voted to renew its support of the A. Philip Randolph Institute with an appropriation of $2,000 a month for the next 12 months.

The next meeting of the council was set for Aug. 7-8 in New York City.

Job Corps

Billions go down the drain in military and government waste—but the puny $100 million saving the Nixon administration seeks by closing down Job Corps camps may cost more in wasted lives than dollars saved. Despite its handicaps, the Job Corps has been a classic success in saving thousands of boys and girls at the bottom of the economic ladder.

"Why don't they audit the public schools?" Sen. Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin asked when the kids in the Job Corps camps were criticized for not reading better.

The Job Corps took most of society's failures and did a remarkable job in fixing their teeth, teaching them to read and write, giving them a healthy diet for the first time in their lives, and enabling many to learn a useful trade.

Without one GOP vote, 40 liberal and moderate Democrats tried to save the Job Corps centers scheduled for closing—but they could not buck the conservative coalition in the Senate. Thus the Cranston resolution, strictly advisory, was lost. The Nixon administration continues to shut down centers which rescued many young kids from a lifetime of poverty and despair.

"Right—the Job Corps should be restricted to well-bred, well-to-do people like us."

The ABM Issue

The ABM—that costly new weapons system which will rob Americans of billions needed to make our cities better places to live in—can go either way.

The Senate has the votes now to kill the ABM for good. The House is a different question.

The ABM is the shorthand name for "anti-ballistic missile" which has had many lives as the Pentagon has tried to keep it alive. In its latest reincarnation as Safeguard, the ABM is expected to cost $7 billion.

But the history of most new weapons is that preliminary costs very soon balloon much more than the original costs. One estimate of the ABM before it was modified came to as high as $100 billion.

Why is the ABM bad? Several reasons. First, there are many scientific doubts that it would even work. Second, it will undoubtedly set off a new arms race.

Finally, there is a growing feeling in the nation that the American people need a re-ordering of priorities.

Instead of spending more and more for arms, we ought to be making the United States a fit place to live in.

During the Memorial Day recess many members of the House of Representatives will be home. They ought to be talked to about the ABM.

Even the conservative chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. Mahon of Texas, is now openly questioning the blankcheck approach of the military. Ask your own Congressman what he thinks.

Priorities

As America's space technology continues to astound the whole world, many Americans are seriously questioning where the emphasis should be as we grapple with problems at home and on earth. The superior technology that puts a rocket around the moon can be used to build houses and schools.

"A nation's defense effort is always a relative thing; it has no particular meaning except as it relates to the effort of a supposed enemy. Recently I asked the Library of Congress to give me some figures on total defense spending of all the major nations of the world, including those we might class as 'the enemy.' Because we can't be too certain about communist defense spending figures, and because total economic production is almost as important as defense production in assessing military strength, I also asked for estimates of Gross National Product. Here is what I learned about 'the enemy':

Country	Gross National Product (1966)	Defense Spending (1967-68)
Soviet Union	$ 357 billion	$32 billion
China	74 billion	7 billion
Communist bloc countries of Eastern Europe	115 billion	5 billion
Total 'Enemy'	$ 546 billion	$44 billion

"Now let's see what the comparable figures are for the United States and its allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organizations, ignoring for the moment our other treaty organizations and other friendly, capitalist countries around the world:

Country	Gross National Product (1966)	Defense Spending (1967-68)
United States	$ 743 billion	$73 billion
NATO Countries	481 billion	21 billion
Total 'Our Side'	$1,224 billion	$94 billion

"You will note that the United States alone has more than doubled the Gross National Product of the Soviet Union, and with our allies we have more than doubled the GNP of the Soviet Union and its allies (assuming China can be considered an 'ally' these days). Also, remember that our GNP has continued to climb rapidly; at the end of 1968 it was $861 billion, and it's expected to reach $920 billion this year. Our defense spending is up, too; excluding Vietnam, it is going up $4 billion this year."—From "Preparing for Peace III, The Tough Problem of Priorities," Newsletter of Congressman MORRIS UDALL of Arizona.

Military spending eats up 10 percent of our gross national product today. Too much of this is sheer, unadulterated waste. For the first time, Congress is taking a hard look at every request for new weapons and new military outlays. The military spending for "our side" and "the other side," listed here by Congressman Udall, is a lesson we must all take to heart in deciding where to put our money, where we place our national priorities.

Students

The turmoil and bitterness on campuses today is part of a deep unrest among millions of America's young people who ask searching questions about the very destiny of this country. Much of it is ugly, uncouth, and even contemptuous. Three observers comment here on what's behind the confrontations which baffle and irritate so many adults.

"If you ask a kid in college nowadays how he'd like to see himself 20 years hence—You could ask that question 10 years ago and he might tell you, 'Well, the way things are going, I'll have a decent income and a house in the suburbs and maybe two cars and my kids will be in a good private school, and I'll have a certain status in the community.'

"You don't get that response any more. Those things don't seem particularly good to the present students. They don't see that as an end in life. They see that it hasn't done much for their parents. And there's something much worse than that.

"And that is that if you really push matters far enough —and there, you really have to push, and they won't even tell you, frequently, no matter how hard you push —they're not sure they'll be physically in existence 10, 15, 20 years hence.

"And nobody can be sure, and the more expert the person you go to, the clearer that becomes. So they really are a generation that isn't sure it has a future. They don't see that future, and they sure don't want what their parents got."—From an interview with Prof. GEORGE WALD, Chicago Sun-Times, May 18, 1969.

"We ought to welcome the revolt as the one way to prod us into a better America. To meet it with cries of 'law and order' and 'conspiracy' would be to relapse into the sterile monologue which precedes all revolutions. Rather than change old habits, those in power always prefer to fall back on the theory that all would be well but for a few malevolent conspirators. It is painful to see academia disrupted, but under the surface were shams and horrors that needed cleansing. The disruption is worth the price of awakening us. The student rebels are proving right in the daring idea that they could revolutionize American society by attacking the universities as its soft underbelly. But I would also remind the students that the three evils they fight—war, racism and bureaucracy—are universal. The Marxism-Leninism some of the rebels cling to has brought into power a bureaucracy more suffocating than any under capitalism; the students demonstrate everywhere on our side but are stifled on the other. War and imperialism have not been eliminated in the relations between communist states. Black Africa, at least half-freed from the white man, is hardly a model of fraternity or freedom. Man's one real enemy is within himself. Burning America down is no way to Utopia. If battle is joined and our country polarized, as both the revolutionists and repressionists wish, it is the better and not the worser side of America which will be destroyed. Someone said a man's character was his fate, and tragedy may be implicit in the character of our society and of its rebels. How make a whisper for patience heard amid the rising fury?"—From "In Defense of the Campus Rebels," I. F. STONE'S WEEKLY, May 19, 1969

Educators have become chanters of incantations rather than speakers of truth, according to Sister Joel Read, president of Alverno College in Milwaukee.

"This has been exposed most rapidly and clearly on our campuses.

"I am not saying that the prophets of our times are the radical youth of the nation. I am saying that all of us involved in this crucial investment which every society makes and terms education are becoming slowly and painfully aware that things are awry in our house.

"Why have the students been the ones to bring this irrelevance to the fore? Compare the student of 1939 with the student of 1969. The crises of 1939 were no less grave than those of today.

"But the student of 1969 has seen on his television screen the Russian takeover of Czechoslovakia, the political conventions of 1968, the assassination and funeral of Robert Kennedy, the funeral of the Rev. Martin Luther King, the daily reports and the reports in depth of the Vietnam war, the reports in depth of the riots in the cities and the riots on the campuses, the debates in the United Nations, the debates in congressional committees, the state and national politics."

Students today, said Sister Joel "have seen close up more suffering, more injustice, more terror, more destruction, more tragedy than most of us have read about when we came to college. It is surprising so few of them are cynical.

"I'm honestly convinced that the crises that dislocate and disrupt our times are not the crises of disintegration and decline. The crises come because we are in the midst of the greatest and most promising revolution in all human history.

"Millions of human beings on all of the continents, including our own, are assuming responsibility for their own life and destiny. The crises come from a release of hope in once darkened areas, so long shackled by the old slaveries of ignorance and poverty and disease. How can we expect such cataclysmic changes to take place without travail and without disruption?

"We have one foot in a world that is going and one foot in a world that is coming, and the world that is going hasn't gone and the world that is coming hasn't come. It is very difficult to live in this twilight zone."

WEEKEND WRAPUP

We have a new Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He's regarded as a constitutional conservative, but these things have a funny way of working out. Earl Warren proved much more liberal than anybody ever thought he'd be. Justice Burger will certainly put his own stamp on the Court. It's too early to predict just how he will rule. . . . Insiders in the Senate are predicting the ABM issue is dead. The White House simply doesn't have the votes. The anti-ABM group has been bi-partisan from the start. It's been briefed by some of our country's best brains. The anti-ABM votes are not expected to budge. Things are not that rosy in the House where the Pentagon has been able to win more followers. . . . Chairman George Mahon of the House Appropriations Committee is one of the most powerful men in Congress. Last week he traded some harsh words with Chairman Mendel Rivers of the Housed Armed Services Committee. The wire services carried the clash all over the nation. There wasn't a word of it the next day in the Congressional Record. The two agreed to "clean it up" before the Record was printed. The dispute between Mahon and Rivers illustrates the kind of skepticism about military spending growing among conservatives in Congress. There was a long time—20 years or more—when the Pentagon and the White House could breathe the magic words "national security" and Congress would bend its knee and sign on the dotted line. Our military budget last year was $80 billion. Many sobersides in Congress, like Mike Mansfield, think we can cut the budget by $8 billion and not change our military position in the slightest. Sen. Goldwater last week criticized attacks on the military-industrial complex and said the military was being made "the goat" for America's weariness with the Vietnam war. It goes much deeper than the war. There's a general feeling we can save money to make life better at home by giving the military budget the same hard look we give everything else. . . . Sen. George McGovern in True magazine this month claims that rich people are getting the biggest handouts from the federal government. "The real scandal in this country," he states, "lies in the handouts to the rich which amount to many times the $3 or $4 billion it would cost to see that hungry Americans get enough nourishing food to escape permanent mental and physical handicap in childhood, have the health and vigor to work and make a contribution to society in their adult years, and to be free from want and malnutrition when they grow old. Critics of aid to the poor insist that federally funded programs weaken the moral fiber of the needy. Although few are willing to say that subsidies have weakened the moral fiber of the rich, one must wonder about the fiber of a nation whose priorities show such contempt for human value." . . . A new wave of UAW citizen-lobbyists has been in Washington making the rounds of Capitol Hill. Some 300 or so from the independents, parts, and suppliers councils, from UAW leadership in Kentucky and Indiana (Region 3), and from the International Harvester council have been in Washington to hear reports on trends in their own industry and to lobby Congress for passage of key legislation. Pension reinsurance was a top issue for Board Member Nelson Jack Edwards' group. UAW Vice President Pat Greathouse and his Harvester troops toured the Hill for a wide range of proposals including tax reform and progressive farm programs. . . . Some iron-fisted denunciations of conflict-of-interest and outside income come from the lips of that congressional objector H. R. Gross of Waterloo, Iowa. But what about Mr. Gross himself? Don't be silly. He wouldn't be caught dead telling where every last penny of his income comes from. . . . The student upheavals are beginning to backfire in many places. A lot of people think student rebels come from families where the head of the house was afraid to spank. And they think students have been pampered too much. Ugly as the confrontations are, and they are ugly, the student uprisings compelled many big schools to mend their ways. A recent study shows more foreign students attending our major universities than black Americans. Many colleges are moving rapidly to change that. College professors are starting to care about the job of teaching. Prof. George Wald of Harvard calls the campus disorders "a great disguised yell for help. Those kids are in a world that offers them very little, very little light at the end of the tunnel, a prospect of imminent destruction that pursues them at all times. The only cure for student unrest is adult unrest."

New Jobs Bill Picks Up Wide Support in House

Legislation aimed at providing a job or training leading to a job for every American looking for work has been introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) with more than 100 other congressmen as co-sponsors.

The O'Hara bill has the AFL-CIO's "strongest endorsement," Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said. Joining with labor in launching a major campaign for the bill are leading civil rights, religious and civic organizations.

The legislation would pull together and expand existing manpower programs geared to jobs in private industry.

It would provide incentives for employers to train their present workforce for higher-skilled, higher-paid jobs—opening up new entry-level jobs in the process.

And it would add to this a large-scale public sector job and training program that would both meet unfilled public service needs and provide assurance of full employment.

The goal of the legislation, O'Hara declared, is "to end involuntary unemployment in the United States."

A statement of purposes written into the bill opens with a finding by Congress that to achieve the objective of the 1946 Employment Act "we must assure an opportunity for a gainful, productive job to every American who is seeking work and make available the education and training needed by any person to qualify for employment consistent with his highest potential and capability."

It declares that "the guarantee of meaningful employment opportunities for all Americans requires public investment to the extent the private sector is unable to provide such opportunities."

O'Hara said he foresees a first-year target of 200,000 jobs in the public and non-profit sectors, with the future extent of the program depending on the ability of private industry to provide jobs for those looking for work.

The public sector jobs wouldn't be make-work, he stressed. He cited surveys showing urgent needs of cities, states and rural areas for expanded facilities and services.

Public service jobs would be provided through contracts with government and non-profit agencies, with safeguards to assure that persons hired will be paid prevailing wages, will receive the same benefits as other workers, and will not be used to displace present employes.

Similar safeguards would be written into private industry training and upgrading programs.

A small-scale public sector job program is reportedly included in an Administration manpower bill drafted in the Labor Dept., but still awaiting final White House clearance before being sent to Congress.

The 105 initial sponsors of the O'Hara bill included 19 of the 20 Democratic members of the House Education & Labor Committee—all but Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.). Nearly all of the sponsors are members of the liberal Democratic Study Group of the House.

O'Hara said the government has already had sufficient experience with its assortment of manpower programs to demonstrate the practicality of the approach.

"This bill takes the wraps off," he said, "and lets us really move toward the optimum use of our most valuable natural resources—the hands, muscle and brains of the American people."

MORE THAN 100 congressmen joined Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.) in sponsoring a bill to provide jobs or training for every American looking for work. Going over the list of sponsors are, from left: Clarence Mitchell, director of the Washington office of the NAACP; O'Hara; AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, and Bayard Rustin, of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

The Case for Tax Justice 1

The typical working man draws a paycheck shrunken somewhat by withheld taxes. He thereby pays what he is supposed to pay and usually without complaint. The growing gripe about the tax system is rather that it is rigged in favor of unearned income, in favor of the "loophole set." Many people with high incomes pay much less than their fair share. With congressional hearings on the tax system under way, the AFL-CIO has presented a wide range of proposals aimed at achieving tax justice.

Labor Co-ops and the Housing Crisis 15

While the well-off have no trouble buying housing and public housing promises the best hope for the least well-off, the broad area of moderate-cost housing has long been a problem in America. It usually is in short supply and periodically it is in critically short supply. Union-sponsored cooperatives have been trying to meet this crisis since the 1920s. This article describes the latest and biggest housing co-op of all. Harold Ostroff

The Rising Price of Money 19

When the nation's money managers try to combat inflation by hiking interest rates, a chain reaction occurs. The extra cost of borrowing money gets built-in to almost everything in the economy. It adds hundreds or thousands of dollars to the yearly expenses of each family, millions to businessmen's expenses and billions to the outlays of federal, state and local governments. This article explains how each small hike in interest rates has become a step in an ever-rising cycle over the past 20 years. Elizabeth R. Jager

New Books, Pamphlets and Records 24

A new paperback serves as a reminder of the labor turmoil of an earlier era and reaffirms protest as an American characteristic. New pamphlets present labor's positions on adjusting to automation, on relating man and his environment and on perfecting the social security system.

The 13.5 million members of the unions of the AFL-CIO are, almost without exception, taxpayers. They pay their taxes regularly, payday after payday, through the payroll withholding program. They are loyal Americans; they appreciate the value of government, the services of government, the need for paying for government.

They are willing to pay their fair share.

But they are tired of having to pay the share of other Americans. Specifically, they are tired of paying the share of those Americans whose incomes are greater and whose taxes are lower—the "loophole set" in today's society.

So it is on behalf of the largest organized group of taxpayers in America that the AFL-CIO makes proposals which we believe are based on the doctrine of fair play. There are some who call these measures "tax reform." We think "tax justice" is a better description and that is what we are seeking—tax justice.

The great and growing inequities in the federal tax structure are clear to most taxpayers and reasonably informed citizens.

In 1967, the most recent date for available information, the taxes paid by millionaires averaged only 25 percent of their total income. Twenty-one of these millionaires and 134 other persons whose reported incomes exceeded $200,000 paid not one cent in federal income taxes.

GEORGE MEANY, President of the AFL-CIO, presented labor's tax proposals to the House Committee on Ways and Means on April 1. The above introduction is excerpted from Meany's testimony. The AFL-CIO tax proposals put before the Committee are published here in their entirety.

Yet in that same year, 2¼ million taxpayers whose incomes fell below the government's definition of poverty paid $100 million in income taxes. And the average wage and salary earner with an income of $8,000 paid over 10 percent of his total income in income taxes.

The federal tax structure is rigged against wages and salaries—against income from work. It is rigged in favor of unearned income.

The federal tax on wages and salaries is the full tax rate—and the tax usually deducted from the paycheck. However, those who receive other forms of income are provided with special privileges and exemptions:

- Income gains from the sale of stock or other property are taxed at only half the regular tax rate—with a top maximum rate of 25 percent. Moreover, when stock or other property is passed on to heirs at death, the increased value of the property from the date of purchase is not subject even to this much-reduced capital gains tax.
- Income from interest payments on state and local bonds is completely exempt from federal taxation.
- Sizable portions of the income from oil and gas properties and a large number of minerals never enter the tax stream because non-existent "depletion" expenses are written off.
- Much of the income from real estate escapes taxation since it is written off as depreciation. Such income is not only exempt from taxation but, since it is considered a write-off cost, it provides a tax shelter for the wealthy because it is deducted from other taxable income.

These special tax privileges are the domain es-

Contradictions

Many of the inequities in the taxation system run in direct opposition to the objectives sought through public tax-spending programs.

For example:

- While the nation is being burdened with inflationary pressures and high interest rates, the task of easing these burdens is made more difficult by the tax system. Privileges such as the 7 percent investment credit and accelerated depreciation on real estate fuel the fires of the only source of inflationary demand in the national economy—business investment in plants, machines and equipment.
- $935 million in federal funds are being spent on low- and moderate-income housing; yet $800 million worth of tax loopholes go to real estate operators constructing motels, office buildings, plants and high-rise, high-rent apartment complexes.
- $4.5 billion is spent to "stabilize farm incomes;" yet wealthy non-farmers are encouraged, through the tax system, to disrupt and distort the farm economy.
- The large and growing concentrations of wealth and economic power are a source of growing national concern; yet the income tax system allows $15 billion in appreciated assets to accumulate and be transferred to heirs without ever entering the tax base. At the same time, tax-exempt status is given to certain types of family foundations set up for avoiding taxes and perpetuating control of family and industrial financial dynasties. $8 million is spent enforcing anti-trust laws; yet the tax system provides incentives for those who would merge and "conglomerate."
- Oil, gas and other depletion allowances are justified largely on the basis of encouraging development of domestic productive capacity; yet similar tax benefits flow to those bolstering the productive capability of foreign nations.
- Some $25 billion in federal categorical grant-in-aid funds will go to the states and localities in 1969; yet the amount of federal money available to hard-pressed state and local governments is diluted by allowing interest on state and local bonds to go tax-free, since this exemption costs the Treasury more than the states and municipalities gain.
- The nation is committed to alleviating the plight of its 22 million poor; yet many of these families pay federal income taxes while many of the wealthiest legally ignore the federal tax collector.

—AFL-CIO President George Meany, in testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee.

sentially of the wealthy. But the super-rich and corporations have even further privileges:

- Because of the little-known, unlimited charitable contribution deduction special privilege, many wealthy individuals and businesses can make contributions and save more in taxes than the contribution is worth.
- Tax-exempt family foundations can be set up so wealthy families can control their fortunes in perpetuity without paying taxes.
- Wealthy non-farmers can invest in farm operations which yield imaginary losses that can be charged off against their high non-farm incomes.
- Business deducts 7 percent of the cost of new equipment and machinery from its tax bill—as a special tax credit. And, they can deduct it again as part of depreciation.

As a result of these and similar inequities, wealthy investors and businesses pay considerably less than their full tax burden. But moderate- and low-income taxpayers bear the full brunt of the tax system. This double standard of taxation heaps an unfairly great part of the burden of running the federal government on the shoulders of middle-income wage and salary earners.

These facts are generally known. They are eroding public confidence in the tax structure and in the fairness of the federal government as well. And since Americans expect so much from their tax structure—national defense, public facilities and services, grants-in-aid to the states and local governments—these inequities in the tax structure undermine public support for much-needed expansion of government services for a growing, urban population.

The entire federal tax structure must be overhauled. Tax loopholes for the wealthy must be ended. The relative tax burden on moderate- and low-income families must be eased.

Only twice since its inception in 1913 has the federal tax structure been revised. And these two revisions—in 1939 and 1954—were, according to a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, only "faceliftings."

The case for thorough reform of the federal tax structure is compelling and demonstrated by numerous incongruities and paradoxes. There is another too frequently overlooked aspect.

Americans must pay other taxes. In fact, though federal income tax revenues have grown and still loom largest among the taxes paid by most individuals, state and local taxes have grown at a far faster pace. From 1963 to 1967, states and localities have almost tripled their annual tax take—from $44 billion to $115 billion. In contrast, federal income taxes (corporate and individual) grew from $69 billion to $95 billion, or by slightly over one-third. What's more, the increases in state and local taxes have in the main resulted from levies on property and sales to consumers which take their toll primarily from those whose ability to pay taxes is the least.

The importance of viewing the impact of the total tax structure was dramatically documented in the 1969 Economic Report of the President. Data was presented showing that the combined federal, state and local tax systems converge in such a manner as to redistribute income "away from the poor." At the same time, those of modest and middle incomes are bearing a disproportionately high share of the tax burden, while those with wealth and ability-to-pay escape their fair share.

The impact of these tax changes over the past five years makes the point clear. A $7,500 income family of four, as a result of the net effect of the 1964 federal tax cut and the 1968 increase, had an increase in after-tax income of 2 percent between 1963 and 1968. The rise in social security insurance rates and state and local tax increases over the period resulted in a 3.4 percent cut in after-tax income.

For those at the very bottom of the income scale, these tax changes over the past five years cut into after-tax income by 14.2 percent, while those with incomes of $35,000 and over enjoyed net increases in after-tax income.

Thoroughgoing federal income tax loophole closing and reform would make a substantial contribution toward compensating for the unfair manner in which the burdens of other taxes fall.

Furthermore, it is the federal income tax system that most states look upon as the standard for a good and fair way to allocate the costs of public services. A number of states that do use income taxes use the federal definitions and standards as models for their own systems and three states now "piggyback" their taxes directly upon the federal taxes that their residents must pay.

Yet, as the inequities in the federal system grow and become more and more notorious, the basic principles of taxation based on income and ability-to-pay become suspect and fair-minded state and local legislators find it increasingly difficult to convince those they represent of the advantages of fair taxation methods.

To the extent that states and localities model their systems on the federal "base," the inequities that exist in the federal structure are multiplied. And the basic advantages are lost as other states shy away from taxing income and continue their reliance on inequitable and ineffective consumer and property taxes.

A thorough overhaul of the federal income tax structure must be approached with three objectives in mind:

1. The loopholes of special tax privilege for wealthy families and businesses must be eliminated.
2. The impoverished must be removed from the tax rolls.
3. There must be a reduction in the relative tax burden for low- and moderate-income families.

When certain so-called capital assets are sold, the profit is taxed at only one-half the rates that apply to ordinary income. And the tax rate cannot exceed 25 percent regardless of the amount of the seller's total income. Capital assets under the Internal Revenue Code consist of property such as corporate stocks, vacant land and other assets not held for use in the taxpayer's trade or business.

In addition, profits from the sale of many other assets—although not defined by the Code as capital assets—can also receive this same privileged preferential tax treatment. Profits from the sale of livestock used for draft, dairy or breeding; real estate used in a trade or business; royalties from sales of timber, iron ore and coal deposits can all qualify for preferential treatment as capital gains, as can gains on sales of business machinery and equipment.

The preferential tax rates which apply to these unearned forms of income represent one of the most unconscionable flaws in the tax system. It is this special treatment, according to the Treasury, that is the most important factor in reducing the tax rates of those with high incomes.

Viewed in the context of the three major criteria upon which the tax system is built—equal treatment of equals, progressive rates and neutrality in economic impact—the capital gains tax fails on every count.

- Similarly situated individuals, whose incomes differ not in amount but only because of source, will pay markedly different amounts of taxes. A married man with a wage income of $8,000 will pay $1,000 (excluding surtax) in federal income taxes. If his $8,000 came from capital gains, his tax would be only $354.
- Tax rates on capital gains progress only from 7 percent to 25 percent. Tax rates on wages, salaries and other "ordinary income" go from 14 percent to 70 percent. An $8,000 per year single wage earner who receives a raise of $1,000 will pay a 25 percent tax on this $1,000, the same amount that would be paid by a taxpayer in the $50,000 income bracket who receives $1,000 worth of capital gains.
- Many business and individual decisions to buy, sell, invest, donate, trade, pay dividends, harvest crops, will to heirs, and so forth, hinge upon the Internal Revenue definitions of capital gains and the preferential treatment accorded these gains.

If a corporation, for example, pays dividends to its stockholders, the dividends are taxed as ordinary income. If the corporation retains much of its earnings, swelling the market value of its stock, shareholders can profit from capital gains. If a farmer wanting to sell his orchard harvests his crop first, the profit from selling the crop would be taxed as ordinary income. If he sells the land with the crop unharvested, the entire proceeds will be taxed at the capital gains rate. Hence, by not harvesting his crop, he's increased his after-tax income.

What's more, the capital gains tax escape route combines neatly with many other avoidance schemes, stimulating their use and compounding the tax benefits. Accelerated depreciation on real estate—a loophole which permits postponement of taxes and creates opportunities for tax-loss gimmickry—also paves the way for converting what should be ordinary rental income into capital gains. The depletion allowances for mineral industries, in themselves an unconscionable gimmick for deducting non-existent expenses, also serve as the vehicle whereby ordinary income is unjustifiably converted to capital gains.

Reported capital gains are taxed at only half the normal rate—and never more than 25 percent. Thus, in 1967, some $25.6 billion in capital gains were taxed at one-half the regular tax rate and subject to a maximum of 25 percent.

Another major leak in the tax system, according to the Treasury Department, results from the fact that large amounts of capital gains "fall completely outside the income tax system," since capital gains on assets transferred at death or by charitable donation go tax-free. The Treasury estimates that $15 billion of capital gains in 1967 were not taxed at all through this escape route. If an individual holds an appreciated asset till he dies, the appreciation is not subject to the income tax. If an individual or corporation donates appreciated property to a charitable organization, the appreciation is never taxed—and the full appreciated value can be deducted from other income.

For example, if a taxpayer donates $1,000 worth of stock which cost him $100, he pays no tax on the $900 of appreciated value and is permitted to deduct the full value ($1,000) from his income. If he were in the 50 percent bracket, this gift of an asset which cost him $100 would save him $500 in taxes. If he sold the asset, included half the capital gain in his income, and then contributed the $1,000 in cash, his net tax saving would have been only $275. If the $900 appreciation were taxed at ordinary rates rather than the 25 percent maximum capital gains rate, the donation of this asset that cost $100 would have only yielded a net tax saving of $50.

Moreover, under certain circumstances it is possible for an individual to actually improve his after-tax position by giving away rather than selling an asset.

All told, the capital gains tax yielded only about $5 to $6 billion in revenue in 1967, representing an effective tax rate of less than 15 percent.

The Treasury estimates that, if all capital gains entered the tax base and were taxed as ordinary income, the 1969 revenue increase would be $8.5 billion.

Finally, though capital gains treatment discriminates unfairly between earned and unearned income, the effect is also to discriminate between classes of individuals. The benefits of capital gains flow almost exclusively to the wealthy.

For example, in 1967, one-third of all capital gains reported went to individuals with annual incomes of over $100,000—50,000 income tax returns out of the total 71.7 million filed accounted for 33 percent of the capital gains.

Put another way, after those with incomes of over $100,000 took their capital gains, 99.94 percent of the population was left to share the other two-thirds.

Demonstrating this same point, the U.S. Treasury in its 1969 tax study showed that capital gains reduced the effective rates on taxable income from 55.5 percent to 32.7 percent for those in adjusted gross income brackets of $1 million or over. For those in the $5-$10,000 brackets, capital gains reduced effective rates by only two-tenths of one percent—from 16.4 percent to 16.2 percent. Thus the net result was to water down the progression in effective tax rates from a top of 55.5 percent down to only 32.7 percent.

Oil, gas and other mineral extraction industries are allowed to take deductions for depletion. In principle, depletion for extractive firms is akin to the depreciation allowance taken by other industries and is geared to permit the gradual write-off of capital costs over the life of the investment.

However, the percentage-depletion deduction formula provides a much more generous write-off of otherwise taxable income than depreciation. Moreover, unlike depreciation, the annual deduction from income never stops—it continues even after the cost of the investment has been fully written off. The Treasury estimates that oil, gas and other depletion deductions average 12 times the deduction that would be allowed based on actual costs. In the petroleum industry, for example, 90 percent of the depletion deductions taken are "excessive." Hence, these firms are deducting non-existent costs.

The percentage-depletion formula allows mineral operators to deduct amounts ranging from 5 percent (gravel, sand and clay) up to 27.5 percent (in the case of oil) of the gross income from the property—regardless of the amount of investment. Since the amount that can be deducted is limited to 50 percent of net income, in many cases the result is that only half the net income generated from the property is subject to tax.

Moreover, mineral producers are allowed to immediately write off certain exploration and development costs which, again, under normal accounting practices should be considered as investment costs to be written off over a period of years. And since these costs do not reduce the percentage-depletion allowance, a double deduction for the same capital investment results.

In addition, there are other gimmicks used by mineral industries to circumvent the modest limitations that do exist on the depletion deduction. The carved-out production payment, for example, is in actuality a loan. The proceeds, however, are treated as income in the year received, thereby boosting the depletion deduction that can be taken. When paid off, the loan is considered an expense. These transactions are timed to generate tax advantages which the Treasury estimates cost $200 million in lost revenues.

And again, these abuses become magnified and compounded by providing opportunities for individuals, corporations and their stockholders to defer taxes, convert ordinarily taxable income to preferentially taxed capital gains, and traffic in tax-loss gimmickry by writing off imaginary losses against other income.

According to the Treasury, the 1968 revenue loss due to excess percentage depletion and the immediate write-off of development costs was as follows:

Excess depletion:
to corporations	$1,100 million
to individuals	$200 million
Expensing capital costs:
to corporations	$240 million
to individuals	$60 million
Total	$1,600 million

As a result of these privileges, in 1965 the petroleum industry as a group paid taxes at an effective rate 21.1 percent of total net income and other mineral industries at 24.3 percent. At the same time, the average manufacturing corporation paid taxes at the rate of 43.3 percent—double the rate which applied to extractive industries. In 1966, the 20 oil giants paid taxes at a rate of only 8.5 percent of income.

The two most frequently offered justifications for the tax incentives granted these industries are: (1) special incentives are needed because these businesses are risky, and (2) these resources must be developed domestically for strategic considerations. Yet risk is certainly not unique to mineral development and many other industries are as strategic or more so. What's more, the fact that percentage depletion is also allowed to companies developing the mineral capabilities of foreign nations hardly squares with the notion of developing a domestic productive base.

The most dramatic testimonial to the fallacy of these arguments, however, was contained in a study done under contract with the Treasury by the Consad Research Corporation of Pittsburgh. This study viewed the $1.6 billion tax incentive appropriately in terms of a federal subsidy, since this is the amount of tax revenue the nation loses as a result of the special privileges. The study showed that this $1.6 billion subsidy led to additional national mineral resources valued in the market at only $150 million. Every dollar in federal tax forgiveness yielded 9 cents worth of additional reserves.

And, according to the Treasury's analysis of the Consad study, the depletion allowance encourages excessive drilling and inefficient production methods and discourages research into other potential fuel sources.

interest on state and local bonds

Federal income tax law actually operates on a triple standard in its treatment of various forms of income. Wages, salaries and so-called ordinary income are fully included in the tax base and are subject to the full, progressive rate scale. A second standard applies to income from capital gains, since only half of it enters the tax base and there is a 25 percent limit on the tax rate. A third standard is applied to some forms of income which are completely excluded from the tax base—and, of course, subject to a zero tax rate.

The interest paid to holders of state and local bonds falls into this third category. For the year ended June 30, 1967, U.S. Census Bureau figures show that state and local governments paid out some $3 billion to their bondholders. These governments saved $1.2 billion in interest expense, since the tax-exempt privilege enabled them to sell these bonds at less than market rates of interest. However, the Treasury lost $1.8 billion in revenue. The balance—$600 million—went as tax benefits to wealthy individuals and commercial banks which hold most of the bonds.

Since the Treasury loses more than the state and local governments gain, the tax-exempt privilege is a wasteful as well as back-door method of providing aid to state and local governments. Moreover, this tax-free interest erodes the equity of the income tax system since the tax advantages only go to the wealthy. The Treasury notes that tax-free income from state and local bonds is the second most important factor (capital gains is first) in reducing the taxes of those with incomes of over $100,000 per year.

For example, in 1968 the average yield on high-grade municipal bonds was 4.51 percent and top-rated (Aaa) corporate bonds was 6.18. The tax-exempt status compensates for the lower rate only for those in tax brackets of 27 percent and higher—the rate which applies to a married person with a taxable income in excess of $16,000 per year.

To illustrate, if a married person with taxable income of about $8,000 (22 percent bracket) bought a high-rated tax-exempt municipal rather than a corporate bond, he would lose $1.67 in interest on every $100 invested and save $1.36 in taxes, suffering a net loss of 31 cents for each $100 invested. On the other hand, for someone in the $100,000-or-over bracket, the $1.67 in interest lost saves him $3.83 in taxes—thus, a net gain of $2.16 on each $100 invested in tax-exempt bonds.

Also the benefits of the tax forgiveness to state and local governments often run counter to the needs and objectives of most subsidies. Since the amount of debt most state and local governments can issue is tied to property values, it is the richer areas of the nation that rely heaviest on debt financing. Thus the wealthier areas get the largest subsidies. Similarly, the bonds issued by the smaller, less affluent governments generally are low-"rated" or not "rated" at all by the investment analysts. Consequently, these bonds are considered riskier and, if they are to compete in the bond market, the poorer governments must bear higher interest costs.

On top of this, there has been a rapid growth in the proportion of municipal bonds held by commercial banks. In 1961, these banks purchased 56 percent of the state and local debt and in 1967 roughly 90 percent of the net purchases were attributed to commercial banks. This has resulted in an erratic market for municipal securities, since these banks switch their investment portfolios back and forth in response to demand for business loans.

In times of tight money and rising business loans, commercial banks reduce purchases of municipals and may, in fact, sell them, thereby limiting the market and driving up the interest rates that municipalities must pay. Such developments require states and localities to pay higher and higher interest rates in order to market their bonds.

Hence, in many ways the interest rates a municipality must pay on its debt (and the amount of taxes its citizens must pay as a result) are at the mercy of the commercial banks and the bond raters.

What's more, many state and local governments have abused the tax-exempt privilege by issuing so-called industrial development bonds. These tax-exempt bonds have been used to build factories for private industry—sometimes to the corporation's exact specifications. In this manner, a number of states have pirated firms from other areas, using their federal subsidy for the private benefit of wealthy corporations.

A host of special tax-forgiveness provisions apply to real estate. Taken by themselves, these privileges are hardly justifiable but, when manipulated and combined, they result in unconscionable tax-avoidance opportunities for wealthy real estate operators, investors and speculators.

The major tax-escape route is the special accelerated-depreciation deduction. Under the accelerated formulas, new buildings can be written off at twice normal or "straight-line rates" and the cost of used buildings can be charged off at 1½ times normal depreciation rates. In the case of a new building with a 40-year estimated life, the result is that about 23 percent of its cost can be deducted from income during the first five years of the property's life. For a used building, 17 percent of the investment can be written off in the first five years.

The following table shows the effects of the special depreciation formulas compared to the "straight-line" method which apportions the depreciation deduction equally over the useful life of the asset.

Since depreciation write-offs are considered a cost, these fast write-offs and other costs are subtracted from rental income and the income tax, if any, is paid on the remainder. Often there is no income at all, or even a reported loss in the early years of ownership, as a result of accelerated depreciation.

Technically, the fast write-off provisions mean that tax liabilities are deferred—in principle, the lower taxes in the early life, due to excess deductions, will be made up later as smaller deductions are permitted. To this extent, the excess depreciation results in an interest-free, no-strings federal loan to the real estate operator.

But actually, the accelerated-depreciation special privilege paves the way for other tax gimmickry. First, a good part of the excessive depreciation deductions are never returned to the tax base because the property is sold long before the depreciation deduction runs out. And a good part of that which is eventually taxed is taxed at only half the usual rate, and never more than 25 percent, since it is considered a capital gain.

Combining these advantages with "leverage"—much debt, little equity—the infamous real estate tax shelter is created. The excessive depreciation plus interest charges on the debt result in large bookkeeping tax losses. These phantom losses are in turn washed out against an individual's other income, sheltering it from the federal tax. To take full advantage of this, many high-income individuals join together into syndicates. These syndicates buy or develop high-depreciation property that will show a loss which can be applied to the wealthy investors' other income. What's more, when the properties approach a point when a profit might be shown (depreciation and interest become less than rental income), the property is then sold or refinanced, starting the cycle all over again.

A Treasury study of 19 investors exploiting the real estate shelter showed that the group had a combined income of $2.7 million from their major economic activities. But, since they made investments in real estate, they were able to "shelter" (remove from their otherwise taxable income) $1.5 million and cut their tax bill by more than half.

The average investor in this group, according to the Treasury, had an income of $141,000 from his other interests. He sheltered $77,500 of this from the Internal Revenue Service by his real estate investments and his paper real estate "losses" saved him $45,000 in taxes.

The Treasury also traced the activities of one real estate investor over a seven-year period. This operator had a seven-year income of over $7.5 million. Yet, because of real estate depreciation deductions, he paid the same effective tax rate on his total income as a married wage earner with two children and an annual income of $10,000.

Moreover, real estate operators can unfairly lighten their share of taxes through reporting capital gains in installments, exchanging appreciated property tax-free, and through complicated mortgage-refinancing arrangements.

The privileged treatment real estate investors receive through the tax structure contributes to eroding taxpayer confidence, as do all loopholes, and:

1. Costs some $850 million in terms of federal revenues forgone—expenditures or subsidies granted through the tax system. Fast depreciation alone accounts for a revenue loss of $750 million.

2. Runs in direct opposition to meeting one of our most serious national needs. These privileges serve to channel resources into luxury housing and away from the much-needed improvements and additions to the housing available for those with low and moderate incomes. The Treasury estimates that, of the $850 million in tax benefits flowing to real estate operators, only $50 million went to those investing in low- and moderate-income facilities.

Under the Internal Revenue Code, there are special tax-accounting privileges for farmers—privileges which were developed to ease the bookkeeping chores of ordinary farmers.

However, these accounting privileges are being manipulated to provide windfall tax benefits to wealthy individuals and corporations who operate or invest in farms in order to get tax losses. These losses are not true losses; nevertheless, they can be deducted from the wealthy investor's non-farm income, sheltering it from the federal income tax.

Though most businesses use the "accrual" method of accounting, since it is the most accurate way to reflect the true income of the business, farmers are permitted to choose between use of the accrual method or the "cash" method. Using the cash method, inventories are ignored. The growth in inventories is not balanced off against other costs. Put another way, costs that reflect the building up of an asset (inventories) are deducted from otherwise taxable income, but there is no corresponding adjustment made for increases in the value of the asset (inventory). As a result, certain farm operators abuse this privilege by carefully mismatching costs, and the income generated by these costs, to their tax advantage.

Losses, which under normal (accrual) accounting procedures would result in gains, are created which in turn are used to "shelter" the wealthy investor's non-farm income from his taxable income.

What's more, since many of these "paper" losses actually reflect increases in investment, income taxes that should be paid annually at ordinary rates are postponed until the sale of the inventory, at which time the tax is cut in half because capital gains rates apply. Under these circumstances it is possible for the tax-deductible costs of raising an animal to exceed the taxable gain even though the animal is sold at a profit.

For example, a cash-basis farmer spends $200 over a three-year period in raising a cow and charges the $200 off over the period as an expense. He then sells the cow for $250. His real profit on the transaction was $50; yet, since the entire $250 is considered as capital gains, only half of the $250 ($125) must be reported as taxable income. As a result, he reports $125 in income and deducts $200 in expenses over the three-year period. His tax returns show a $75 loss on a transaction which in actuality yielded a profit of $50.

Under normal accounting techniques, the $200 spent in raising the cow would have been treated as an increase in inventory and would not have resulted in a deductible expense. Upon the sale of the cow, the capital gain would have been $50 and one-half of it, or $25, would enter his taxable income. Hence the "accrual" farmer would have reported $25 in income (although it was actually $50) and no deductions. The "cash" farmer reported income of $125 and expenses of $200.

Moreover, the definition of what are capital assets (and therefore subject to capital gains tax rates) is stretched considerably, to the advantage of certain farmers. The Internal Revenue Code, for example, treats livestock used for draft, dairy or breeding purposes as depreciable capital assets.

Through the use of "leveraging" (much borrowing —little cash investment), the advantages of these special privileges are compounded. The combined effects of interest charges on the money borrowed for the farm investment and the operating losses, that are so easily shown through cash accounting, result in phenomenal phantom tax losses which are washed out against the other income of wealthy farm investors, sheltering it from taxation.

Some insight into how these special privileges are utilized by the wealthy can be found in the annual income tax return data published by the Internal Revenue Service.

In 1967, for example, there were over 1 million tax returns filed showing net farm losses and almost 2 million reporting a net gain. For those taxpayers with adjusted gross income under $50,000, the number of returns showing profits from farm operations exceeded the number showing losses, by rather substantial amounts. The overwhelming majority of actual, operating farmers were in this group.

However, where adjusted gross incomes were over $50,000, more returns showed losses than gains. In the $1 million-and-over income group, only 12 returns showed profits—totaling $74,000—compared to 101 returns claiming losses—totaling $7.6 million.

Obviously, "non-farmers" are investing in farms solely for tax purposes. As a consequence, these non-farmers compete unfairly with legitimate farmers. They distort the farm economy by bidding up the price of farmland and forcing ordinary farmers to compete in the market with those who are totally indifferent to whether they receive a fair price for the product or not.

The Treasury estimates an annual tax loss of some $800 million due to the farm loopholes. By placing a $15,000 limit just on the amount of phantom tax loss that can be applied against other income, some $145 million in revenue could be recouped.

The tax-exempt status granted to certain foundations represents one of the most glaring examples of how a well-intentioned, seemingly desirable tax privilege can become twisted.

As a nation, we recognize that philanthropy is desirable and should be encouraged. In line with this reasoning, individuals are permitted, within certain limits, to deduct from their taxable income contributions to organizations established for religious, charitable, scientific, educational and similar purposes. Likewise, the federal government grants tax-exempt status to the organizations receiving the contributions.

Granting special tax privileges for such contributions or to such institutions raises the same fundamental question as in all tax-forgiveness schemes. The government is relinquishing funds it would otherwise be entitled to and therefore others must pay a higher share of the costs of government. Thus, where there is tax forgiveness, there must also be an assurance that the nation's interests are being served.

Recent investigations into certain tax-exempt foundations—non-profit organizations set up and supported by wealthy families or individuals—have raised some serious doubts as to whether appropriate purposes are in fact being fulfilled and the nation's interest is being served.

Tax-exempt foundations have grown phenomenally—new ones are cropping up at the rate of some 2,000 per year. The assets of the larger foundations are currently estimated at some $20 billion and each of the 27 largest foundations has assets worth $100 million or more.

The philosophy underlying the private foundations, according to a foundation spokesman, is "the systematic use of private funds for public purposes." Unfortunately, the studies of the activities of tax-exempt foundations done by the House Committee on Small Business have shown that in many cases the opposite situation prevails. That is, public funds are being systematically used for private purposes.

Family foundations frequently are used as a means whereby the wealthy can avoid income, gift and inheritance taxes, yet maintain control over wealth. When families donate company stock to private family-run foundations, family control over the business can be assured from generation to generation, while inheritance taxes are avoided. The donor can control the management of the foundation—appointing relatives, rewarding friends and employes. The foundation provides the conduit for donations which reduce the taxes on his business income.

Furthermore, this control can be parlayed to a point where the foundation is used to promote the foundation owner's other business interests. Practices have been uncovered which can be questioned on the basis of unfair competition, conflict of interest, self-dealing, "insider" arrangements to affect stock prices and so forth.

Foundations, for example, can lend money to the founder, his family or the family business at preferential interest rates, thus supplying venture capital for the donor's other interests. The Subcommittee's studies noted situations where suppliers and buyers have made sizable contributions to foundations controlled by customers, indicating underhanded pricing deals. What's more, these organizations can enter into deals whereby, through intricate tax maneuvering, they can buy a business, invest none of their own money and pay the seller more than the market value of the business. On top of this, the deal can be set up as an installment purchase, permitting the seller to convert what should have been ordinary income into preferentially taxed capital gains.

A Prentice-Hall Executive Tax Report, for example, offers this advice:

> Have You Put a Price on Your Business? You may be able to double it—by selling to a Charity.
> Say you're planning to sell your business, and you think a fair price would be five times earnings. If the company earns, say, $101,500 after taxes ($200,000 before), you're probably figuring on selling for about $500,000. If that's the case, STOP RIGHT THERE —you may be shortchanging yourself:
> That business could be worth $1,000,000 to a tax-exempt organization: An ordinary buyer is only interested in earnings after taxes—that's all he gets to see. But a tax-exempt buyer keeps a hundred cents on the dollar. So a fair price to a charity would be five times $200,000, or $1,000,000—twice what you figured!

Commenting on the abuses uncovered, a New York Times editorial added another dimension—that of the increased role of foundations in shaping national policy: "Since almost everyone pays income taxes, the burden of exempting the income of the foundations is borne by the public at large. Yet the public is virtually powerless to influence the ways in which the foundations spend their tax-free dollars."

Generous tax treatment is appropriate for charitable organizations since private philanthropy is an important adjunct to public programs serving the goals of the nation. However, this special treatment is justifiable only if these organizations are in fact using the foundations, and their tax-exempt privilege, for the public good and not merely for the private advantage of a select well-heeled few.

The ordinary taxpayer cannot deduct charitable contributions that exceed 30 percent of his income. However, through use of a little-known loophole—the unlimited charitable-contribution deduction—about 100 of the nation's wealthiest families escape paying $25 million in taxes. Many of these families pay no federal income taxes at all.

Though the loophole alone yields tax benefits to some of the nation's wealthiest, the major part of the tax bonanza comes about through combining the unlimited-deduction gimmick with another loophole—that which permits the contribution deduction to be based on the appreciated value of assets (typically stocks) donated, not the cost. Hence, no tax—not even at privileged capital gain rates—is ever paid on the appreciated value; yet the full amount is allowed as a deduction from income.

The unlimited-deduction privilege seems stringent in that it's only allowed if total contributions plus income taxes paid in eight out of the ten preceding years exceeds 90 percent of taxable income. However, these criteria are easily met by many wealthy individuals whose income comes from non-taxable sources. Thus many who rely upon state and local bond interest, or capital gains, or whose taxable income is "sheltered" by means of excessive depletion or depreciation deductions, can easily give away large percentages of taxable income—since so little of their income is subject to tax.

The Treasury studied the 1964 tax returns of four wealthy "non-taxpayers" and found that each had a total income of between $6 and $10 million and a taxable income of zero. Their incomes came almost entirely from dividends and/or capital gains. Each gave away property close to, or in excess of, the reported adjusted gross income—property which was for the most part appreciated stocks, upon which no capital gains tax was ever paid—and in each case, taxable income and income tax were $0.

As a result, a seemingly innocent and appropriate tax-forgiveness provision geared to encouraging philanthropy serves in the main to divert public revenues to private use. The public revenue cost is far out of proportion to the philanthropic goals forwarded and the difference flows to a privileged few individuals of extreme wealth.

What is more, studies have shown that the charities supported by the contributions of the wealthy are generally quite different from those that receive the bulk of their contributions from the majority of the nation's taxpayers. And this evidence suggests that congressional intent and the national interest in supporting charitable organizations are thwarted.

For example, a 1965 Treasury Department report showed that in the income classes under $20,000, over 80 percent of the contributions went to religious organizations and charities concerned with social welfare, such as the Community Chest and the Red Cross. In contrast, those in the over-$1 million income class gave over two-thirds of their contributions to "other organizations"—principally foundations. Religious and social welfare organizations like the Community Chest received less than 10 percent of the wealthier group's philanthropy.

The investment-credit tax privilege was added to the Internal Revenue Code in 1962 and liberalized in 1964. The privilege was enacted as an effort to spur the economy by encouraging business to invest in new machinery and equipment.

Under this provision, business firms are permitted to deduct from the federal income taxes owed an amount equal to 7 percent of the cost of new machinery and equipment. The full 7 percent can be deducted for firms with tax liabilities up to $25,000. If the tax liabilities are more than $25,000, the amount of credit that can be deducted is limited to one-fourth of their taxable income. In other words, the only limit on the credit is that it cannot reduce the firm's tax bill by more than 25 percent.

In effect, then, the nation's taxpayers are picking up the tab so that a private firm can get a discount on the costs of its equipment.

What's more, prior to 1964, businesses had to deduct the credit from the cost of the investment before they were allowed to write off depreciation. This was changed in 1964 and currently the credit can be taken and the full purchase price can be written off. Thus more than 100 percent of the cost can be written off and, like the oil depletion deduction, imaginary expenses are used to reduce taxable income.

The revenue cost of the credit, according to the Treasury, amounts to $3 billion at fiscal year 1969 levels of business profits and investment. This $3 billion tax forgiveness subsidy induces increased business investment and feeds the only major source of inflationary-demand pressure in 1969—while the entire national economy is burdened with tight money, unprecedented interest rates and other generally restrictive measures.

MULTIPLE SURTAX exemptions

The corporate income tax is a two-step affair. The first $25,000 of profits is taxed at a rate of 22 percent and the remainder is taxed at 48 percent (excluding the temporary 10 percent surtax).

The exemption of the first $25,000 from the full corporate tax rate was made part of the Internal Revenue Code in order to help small corporations.

However, the intent of this provision has been thwarted by many large corporations, which have intentionally organized themselves into chains to shelter much of their income from the full corporate rate.

Thus, by spinning off into subsidiaries, a corporation can reduce its taxes annually by $6,500 per subsidiary. A single corporation, for example, with a net profit of $1 million would pay a tax of $473,500. If the same corporation operated through 40 subsidiaries, each showing a profit of $25,000, the tax would be cut by more than half—down to $220,000.

The Treasury estimates that the exemption results in a reduction of the tax rate on corporations generally from 48 percent to 45.8 percent and a revenue loss of approximately $1.8 billion. The combined effect of both the 7 percent investment credit and the $25,000 exemption brings the effective rate down to only 43.4 percent and the revenue loss to some $4 to $5 billion.

Moreover, this special privilege amounts to a tax incentive that encourages unsound corporate arrangements. It also adds an element of discrimination between those types of corporations that can easily be split up to take advantage of the special privilege and those that cannot.

As a result, a benefit intended to help small business also provides tax-windfall opportunities to large, highly profitable operations.

conglomerates

The greatest wave of mergers in American history is now rolling through the economy. This great movement towards the concentration of economic power has been building up over the last 20 years. It obscures the peaks of the two previous merger waves in 1899 and 1929. The number of mergers of mining and manufacturing companies zoomed from 219 in 1950 to 844 in 1960 to nearly 1,000 in 1966 and over 2,400 in 1968, according to the Federal Trade Commission.

Not only are the "bigs" taking over the "smalls" but minnows are swallowing whales and the "bigs" are merging with other "bigs." Conglomerate marriages with increasing frequency involve partners with assets over $10 million. In 1966, there were 101 mergers involving an acquired company with assets in excess of $10 million. The Federal Trade Commission reported 192 such mergers in 1968, with assets of the acquired companies totaling $12.6 billion. The 200 largest companies acquired 70 firms in mergers in 1968, the FTC reported.

As a result, one out of every six firms that made Fortune Magazine's 1962 top-500 list has completely disappeared.

These conglomerate corporations grow in all directions by acquiring companies in any industry or product-line, no matter how unrelated. They operate in all kinds of different industries and markets.

The great merger movement of recent years has brought an alarming increase in the concentration of economic power in the hands of the major corporations. In 1967, the 200 largest manufacturing corporations held nearly 59 percent of the total assets of all manufacturing corporations—up from about 48 percent in 1948. The 78 giant manufacturing corporations, with assets of $1 billion or more, held 43 percent of the assets of manufacturing corporations in 1968 and received 49 percent of the profits of all manufacturing corporations.

The concern is not with large conglomerate corporations merely because they are large. It is the effects which must be examined. The immediate questions concern plant closedowns and the impact on collective bargaining and the local community. Beyond this, what does the concentration of economic power do to the political system and economic system in terms of prices, competition, efficiency and inventiveness?

These questions go beyond those that can be answered through the tax structure. They involve the anti-trust laws and the operations of the Justice Department, as well as such other government agencies as the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Yet it is clear that there are tax inducements to those who would merge and the tax structure adds thrust to the corporate take-over movement.

- By "swapping debt for equity" (offering bonds in exchange for stock) the acquiring firm has to pay bond interest rather than stock dividends. Interest is tax-deductible; dividends are not. Because of this tax advantage, the purchaser can offer a bond (debenture) supposedly valued at more than the stock, creating what has been labeled "funny money."

The seller also has a tax advantage since he pays no taxes on the transaction until the bond is paid off. Hence, it is the nation's taxpayers who are helping to finance the take-over.

- If the seller receives stock in the acquiring firm in exchange for his old stock, the transaction under most circumstances is tax-free. Of the 352 major acquisitions that took place in 1967 and 1968, some 90 percent were tax-free. The "new" firms were valued in the stock market at $3 billion higher than the pre-merged firms; yet no taxes were paid.
- The tax-loss "carry-over" provisions in the Internal Revenue Code lead to anomalous situations where a firm showing a loss becomes a more desirable partner for a merger than a profitable one. And again the nation's taxpayers are the losers. If a firm has losses, it pays no taxes. If the firm merges with a profitable firm, its losses can be washed out against the acquiring firm's otherwise taxable income. And, of course, other tax loopholes can be called into play to create phantom losses and situations similar to the tax havens built by wealthy real estate speculators and tax-loss farmers.

Moreover, other business tax privileges—the 7 percent investment credit, for example, and accelerated depreciation—help to provide many corporations with unreasonably large amounts of cash (depreciation allowances plus retained profits) after payment of taxes and dividends to stockholders. The cash is thus available for such ventures as those involved in the sharp rise in foreign investment and buying out other firms.

other loopholes
FOR THE WEALTHY

There are, unfortunately, many other loopholes of special privilege for rich people and corporations that should be closed. Stock options, for example, permit corporate executives to receive income in the form of stock deals that are not reported or taxed as salaries, but are taxed on the sale of the stock as capital gains. And other opportunities to defer taxes on salaries and convert salary income to much lower-taxed capital gains are available to high-paid executives. Tax-deductible "business" vacations are the privilege primarily of wealthy businessmen and executives, as are the non-taxable benefits that accrue to those with lavish expense accounts.

Earnings from operating ships or aircraft registered in a foreign country are tax-exempt. This encourages "runaways." In 1968, more American-owned tonnage was registered under foreign flags than under the U.S. flag. And special tax gimmicks also apply to corporations operating through foreign subsidiaries.

proposals
TO CLOSE THE LOOPHOLES

To close these loopholes and bring the federal individual and corporate income tax systems into line with America's standards of fair play, the AFL-CIO urges adoption of the following proposals.

1. Capital Gains.

Elimination of preferential tax treatment of capital gains for both individuals and corporations. Such gains should be taxed at regular tax rates. At the same time, the present income-averaging provisions should be broadened to include capital gains.

Approximate revenue gain: $6-7 billion.

2. Capital Gains on Property Transferred at Death.

All appreciation (difference between original cost and market value) should be taxed in full on transfer at death. The tax rate should apply to all appreciation occurring after date of enactment; one-half the tax rate should apply to all gains occurring between an appropriate date such as January 1, 1950, and the date of enactment.

The tax should be allowed as a deduction for estate-tax purposes. It should not apply on transfers between the decedent and spouse nor to estates valued at less than $60,000.

To prevent "forced" sales of assets, appropriate installment-payment procedures should be adopted.

Approximate revenue gain: $3-4 billion.

3. Depletion.

Deductions for depletion should not be permitted to be taken after the cost of the property has been fully written off.

Approximate revenue gain: $1.5 billion.

4. Interest on State and Local Bonds.

All interest on state and local debt securities, issued after the date of enactment (following an appropriate transition period), should be subject to the income tax. The federal government should guarantee the bonds and pay the issuing state or local government an amount equal to one-third of the interest cost on such taxable issues. No federal guarantee or interest-rate subsidy should be permitted for industrial development bonds, regardless of the amount of the issue.

There would be a net revenue gain, after taking into account the cost of the subsidy and the guarantee, of approximately $100 million.

5. 7 Percent Investment Tax Credit.

The 7 percent investment tax credit should be repealed.

Approximate revenue gain: $3 billion.

6. Accelerated Depreciation on Real Estate.

Accelerated depreciation (depreciation in excess of straight-line) should be disallowed on all real estate except low- and moderate-housing.

Approximate revenue gain: $700-800 million.

7. Limitation of Deductions Attributable to Farming Operations.

Each dollar of non-farm income over $15,000 should reduce the amount of farm loss that can be deducted from non-farm income by $1. This provision should not apply to farm losses resulting from taxes, interest, casualty, drought and sale of farm property. This provision should not apply to farmers using the accrual method of accounting.

Approximate revenue gain: $145 million.

8. Unlimited Charitable Contributions.

The special unlimited charitable-contribution deduction should be repealed immediately.

Approximate revenue gain: $50 million.

9. Multiple Surtax Exemptions for Corporate Income Tax.

Commonly controlled business enterprises should, after an appropriate transition period, be limited to only one $25,000 surtax exemption.

Approximate revenue gain (when fully effective): $235 million.

10. Tax-Exempt Foundations.

(1) Financial transactions between a foundation and its founders, contributors, officers, directors or trustees should be prohibited.

(2) Foundations should be required to spend their incomes within one year of receipt.

(3) Foundations should not be permitted to own 20 percent or more of any business unrelated to their charitable function. A reasonable time should be allowed for presently organized foundations to comply with this provision.

(4) If a donor maintains control of a business or property after it is contributed, no donation deduction from taxes should be allowed until the foundation disposes of the property or the donor's control over the property ends.

(5) Foundation borrowing to buy investment properties should be prohibited. Foundation lending should be limited to appropriate charitable functions.

(6) A limitation, such as 40 years, should be placed on the life of foundations.

(7) Congress should carefully examine the problems posed by the actual operations of foundations and the need for some degree of federal regulation of the use of the tax-exempt funds of foundations.

11. Conglomerates.

The skyrocketing trend of business mergers requires detailed examination, including the anti-trust laws and the operations of the appropriate government agencies such as the Justice Department, Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

A thorough investigation should also be conducted to determine the extent to which the federal tax structure contributes to this alarming trend of corporate mergers and acquisitions.

Among the tax provisions that should be examined are those which permit:

(1) Corporations to deduct interest payments on debt used to finance mergers and acquisitions.

(2) Capital gains taxes to be paid in installments when stock is exchanged for debt securities.

(3) Tax-free exchanges on corporate stock transfers made for purposes of mergers and acquisitions.

(4) Corporations to "carry over" the operating and capital losses of an acquired firm.

* Wage and salary income less personal exemptions and deductions.
Note: Figures exclude 1968 surtax.

In addition, the penalty tax provisions applying to excessive amounts of retained profits should be made workable in the light of recent experience.

In the event the above proposals cannot be adopted quickly, we propose No. 12 and No. 13 as interim measures.

12. Allocation of Deductions.

Individuals and corporations should be required to allocate certain deductions between taxable and non-taxable income.

Under present law, those who receive tax-exempt income derive a double benefit. The income never appears on the tax return, hence no tax is paid. Secondly, personal or non-operating business deductions can be deducted in full from taxable income.

Before such deductions are permitted, since they are designed to define ability-to-pay, total income (taxable and exempt income) should be taken into account. Thus individuals with excluded income, as defined below, in excess of $10,000 should be required to allocate certain personal deductions in line with the ratio their adjusted gross income bears to adjusted gross income plus exempt income. The deductions that should be allocated are: interest and tax payments, casualty losses, charitable contributions, medical expenses and cooperative housing expenses. The allocation formula should be as follows:

$$\text{Deductions} \times \frac{\text{Adjusted Gross Income}}{\text{AGI Plus Exempt Income Minus $10,000}} = \text{Allowable Deductions}$$

Excluded income which would cause deductions to be allocated should include the following:

(1) One-half of capital gains.

(2) State and local bond interest.

(3) Depletion taken after the cost of the property has been written off.

(4) The difference between the cost and the market value of property donated to charity.

(5) Depreciation on real estate taken in excess of straight-line, except for low-and moderate-housing.

Corporations with excluded income, as defined above, in excess of $25,000 should be required to allocate non-operating expense deductions between net profit from operations and excluded income.

The allocation formula should be as follows:

$$\text{Non-operating Deductions} \times \frac{\text{Net Operating Profit}}{\text{Net Operating Profit Plus Exempt Income Minus $25,000}} = \text{Allowable Non-operating Deductions}$$

Approximate revenue gain from allocation of deductions: $250 million.

13. Minimum Tax on Exempt Income.

A 25 percent tax should be levied on the amount of excluded income which exceeds $10,000 for individuals and $25,000 for corporations, plus any amount of deductions disallowed under allocation-of-deductions formula. The "excluded income" subject to this tax should include the following:

(1) One-half capital gains.

(2) State and local bond interest.

(3) Depletion taken after the cost of property has been written off.

(4) The difference between the cost and the market value of property donated to charity.

(5) Depreciation on real estate taken in excess of straight-line, except for low- and moderate-housing.

The effect of the allocation of deductions and minimum tax proposals on an actual case has been cited by the U.S. Treasury. The case shows a taxpayer with a total income of $1.3 million paid a nil effective tax rate (.03 percent). Under the proposals suggested by the AFL-CIO, the effective tax rate would have been 21.8 percent.

EFFECT OF AFL-CIO TAX-RELIEF PROPOSALS FOR LOW INCOME GROUPS*

* Increase in minimum standard deduction to $600 plus $100 per dependent. Reduction in first two bracket tax rates to 9% and 13%.

 1966 Department of Health, Education, and Welfare non-farm poverty income levels, adjusted for change in living costs 1966-1968.

Approximate revenue gain from 25 percent minimum tax: $1.5 billion.

Finally, all special tax-forgiveness proposals offered under the guise of "incentives" which would provide additional loopholes for the wealthy and further erode the fairness of the tax structure should be rejected. All proposals to adopt a federal retail sales tax—whether called "value-added" taxes or offered clearly as a tax on consumers—should also be rejected.

1. The minimum standard deduction should be increased from the present $200 plus $100 per exemption to $600 plus $100 per exemption.

This proposal would exempt from federal income tax the majority of persons below the government-defined poverty level and significantly reduce the tax payments of all persons at or near the poverty level.

The revenue cost would be about $1.2 billion.

2. The standard deduction should be increased from the present 10 percent with a $1,000 maximum to 15 percent and a $2,500 maximum.

This proposal would bring standard deductions closer in line with the actual deductions claimed by most taxpayers. It would simplify reporting for the great majority of taxpayers and would provide tax relief for all those whose itemized deductions amount to less than 15 percent of income or $2,500. Most of the relief would flow to those in the $5-$20,000 income range.

The revenue cost would be approximately $2 billion.

3. The first two individual income-tax bracket rates should be reduced from the current 14 percent and 15 percent to 9 percent and 13 percent, respectively.

This proposal would provide tax relief to all taxpayers, but the major portion of the tax deduction (approximately 95 percent) would go to those with annual incomes below $20,000.

The revenue cost would be about $3.4 billion.

4. Moving-expense Deductions.

Deductible moving expenses should be broadened to include certain non-employer-reimbursed expenses such as those related to sale of old residence—real estate commissions and advertising costs and costs of settling an unexpired lease; pre-move househunting trips; and temporary lodging costs (for worker and family). These additional costs should be subject to an overall limitation of $2,000. Present treatment of other deductible moving expenses—unreimbursed expenses of transporting the employe, his family and belongings in a job-connected move—should continue.

The revenue cost would be about $100 million.

Labor Co-ops and the Housing Crisis

by Harold Ostroff

A few months ago, 30 adults and 20 children moved into their new homes at Co-op City. These first 16 families were the vanguard of 15,382 families who by 1971 will be living in this new $300 million cooperative community now being built in the northeast corner of New York City.

In this group of first families were two mechanics, two upholsterers, two office clerks, two salesmen, a grocer, a window washer, a draftsman, a civil servant, a dry cleaner, a waiter and two families who are retired. The oldest "head of family" was born in 1887, the youngest was born 41 years later. The youngest of 20 children was born last December 29.

Occupations, ages, colors, religions, political affiliation, union membership—all are mixed at Co-op City. There is, however, one important similarity each family has in common—each is a part owner of the cooperative. They became so when they made an investment to help make this cooperative a reality. When the city is completed, their investments will have provided $32 million of the cost of building the community.

Cooperative housing is not a panacea for solving all the myriad complexities of the entire housing situation confronting urban and rural America. It is, however, a means for people with limited resources as well as for those with higher incomes to join together to obtain decent homes, on a non-profit basis, at very reasonable costs. Co-op City is but the latest and most dramatic illustration of this kind of housing.

Organized labor's involvement in housing cooperatives dates back to 1926, when the Amalgamated Clothing Workers undertook the sponsorship of the first low-cost housing cooperative in the Bronx, New York.

The general housing situation which prompted the union's involvement in housing in the mid-1920s was not very different from conditions which confront working people today. There was a great shortage of moderate-cost housing. The shortage resulted in high rents in the apartments which were available, apartments the average wage earner could not afford. The same slums which plague the city today in large measure existed then.

The size of the first cooperative was small, 303 apartments. Its significance must be measured not in its size, but in the magnitude of the concept that working people can own multi-million dollar enterprises and supply themselves with homes on a non-profit basis. This was indeed a revolutionary idea in 1926 in the United States—and it still is.

Under the leadership of Sidney Hillman, Jacob S.

HAROLD OSTROFF is Executive Vice President of the United Housing Foundation. The UHF is a federation of 62 non-profit organizations whose aim is to promote better housing through cooperatives.

Potofsky and Abraham E. Kazan, the man designated by Hillman to develop the union's cooperative housing program, the pioneers of the Amalgamated Housing Cooperative established the principles which were to become basic guidelines for similar communities in the future.

The objective of the cooperative was to provide its members with good housing at the most reasonable price possible. To achieve this end, the cooperative was a non-profit, non-speculative enterprise. The member's investment was based on the number of rooms in his apartment. (In the first Clothing Workers' project, the investment was $500 a room. The monthly carrying charges averaged $12 per room per month.) Each member of the co-op had one vote regardless of the size of his investment. There was no proxy voting. The members elected the Board of Directors at an annual meeting. Each member received a full financial report annually. The cooperative was open to all. The cooperative was neutral in matters of religion and politics. When a member wanted to leave the cooperative, he gave the corporation first option to repurchase his stock at its par value.

These were the basic principles and they proved successful. In time, the original development quadrupled in size and, by 1965, the union had sponsored three additional cooperatives which provided homes for 3,628 families.

Since their inception, open membership has always been the first basic principle of cooperatives. One of the most encouraging aspects of the development of housing cooperatives has been that they create naturally-integrated communities. More and more frequently, people of minority groups discover the economic and social advantages cooperatives provide. The economic benefits of low monthly carrying charges for decent housing are available to people, regardless of color.

Where black and white live together sharing the common bond of home ownership, they have done so in harmony.

The 50,000 families living in housing cooperatives have demonstrated that, given the opportunity for participating in practical programs for self-help, the essential ingredient which has made cooperatives successful, is the common bond of mutual ownership which exists between the members. This is particularly true in housing cooperatives where the members have made substantial investments in their homes. Having invested two or three thousand dollars in his cooperative, the average member is interested in and concerned with the welfare of the organization. It also becomes apparent that cooperation means not only self-help but also mutual aid. People working together for their mutual self-interest is essential for the successful operation of a cooperative enterprise. Thus it is that people of different occupations, different interests, different colors, different religions, different political views and different economic circumstances live and work together in cooperatives.

By the end of the second World War, the housing shortage had become much more acute. Housing for families with so-called middle incomes was virtually non-existent. Most of the housing which was built was designed and priced for upper-income families. Having observed the success of the Amalgamated's first two cooperatives, a number of other unions entered the field. Most notable were the Ladies' Garment Workers Union, Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Amalgamated Meat Cutters Union. By the mid-1950s, a number of largescale housing cooperatives had been built.

By 1950, it was obvious that the time was propitious to establish a central organization to promote and develop cooperatives on a larger scale in New York City. Conferences were held among the leadership of trade unions and among existing cooperatives to establish such an organization. In 1951, the United Housing Foundation was incorporated. Jacob S. Potofsky, President of the Clothing Workers, is president of the foundation and Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., Financial Secretary of Local 3 of the Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, is vice president.

The foundation is a federation of trade unions, cooperatives and other non-profit organizations who work together to develop moderate-cost housing cooperatives. The combined strength of the members of the organization has resulted in the foundation sponsoring and building eight cooperatives which have provided homes for 30,442 families in New York City. These communities were built at a cost of $536.5 million.

Another $125 million, 6,000-unit cooperative is now on the drawing boards. Together with the cooperatives which were built prior to 1951, and those which were built by others but which have joined the foundation, over 50,000 families are living in cooperatives which are members of the United Housing Foundation.

Unions elsewhere in the nation also have been involved in sponsoring housing cooperatives. In Roxbury, Mass., Service Employes' Local 254 sponsored a $3.3 million 200-unit project and then backed a companion $5.6 million 314-unit co-op. In Connecticut, the Greater New Haven Labor Council sponsored a 101-unit project. Communications Workers' Local 3808 sponsored a 76-unit co-op in Nashville, a companion to an earlier 178-unit project.

The housing problems of New York City are no different from those of other major cities in the nation. They are just more complex and larger because of the size of the city. For example, it is estimated there are 800,000 units of substandard housing in the city. This means there are some 3 million New Yorkers living in unfit housing. This would mean a population almost equivalent to the size of the city of Chicago is inadequately housed.

Cooperatives have made more progress in the city of New York than in any other area of the country. But compared to the great need which exists for decent moderate-cost housing, the result must be considered small. Nevertheless, the leaders of the United Housing Foundation believe that the type of structure developed in New York City can be used in other cities to stimulate similar programs.

Historically, the State of New York has led the nation in progressive legislation intended to stimulate the development of moderate-cost housing. It is encouraging to observe that other states recently have adopted similar legislation.

The successful undertaking of largescale housing developments requires the cooperation of government at all levels as well as the concern and commitment of people and knowledgeable organizations.

In the case of Co-op City, for example, the cooperative has received a $26 million mortgage from the New York State Housing Finance Agency. The interest rate on the mortgages will be considerably below conventional mortgage rates. The City of New York has granted the cooperative a 50 percent tax abatement for 30 years. But even during the abatement period, the city will be receiving some $6.6 million more in taxes a year than it had received from the site before its redevelopment. The plans for the development had to be approved by the City's Planning Commission. The larger community, as well as Co-op City, will benefit from the addition of three elementary schools, two intermediate schools and a new high school being built in the area.

What is being achieved at Co-op City demonstrates what can be done when there is a commitment for housing. The cooperative will provide some 55,000 to 60,000 people with new homes. The people are supplying approximately 10 percent of the cost based on investments of $450 a room. The cooperative will supply its members with centrally air conditioned apartments at an average cost of $25 per room per month. Apartments of comparable value in New York City, in the private market, rent for between $80 and $100 per room per month. Apartment sizes at Co-op City range from one to three bedrooms.

Building a $300 million "city" for 60,000 people is not an undertaking for amateurs. It requires the knowledge and experience of professional planners, architects, engineers and builders, as well as the skills of thousands of experienced craftsmen.

Cooperatives are independent and autonomous organizations, owned and controlled by their members. But this does not mean that largescale cooperatives can be built by the "democratic process." They cannot. The future owners do not design the site or plan of the apartments; nor do they decide who will build the development, nor do they vote to determine what color the walls will be painted. These and all other matters involved with construction are entrusted to the Board of Directors and the professions they engage to build the development.

Cooperatives sponsored by the United Housing Foundation have followed the example of the first Clothing Workers' cooperative in developing other kinds of cooperatives to meet the needs of people. In every community, people have organized their own credit unions, cooperative supermarkets, pharmacies and optical centers. Through the United Housing Foundation, cooperatives developed their own insurance company to provide members with automobile insurance. There is also a city-wide furniture cooperative. These self-help enterprises couple meaningful participation with practical economic benefits and savings.

Last year, two presidential commissions cited the lack of decent housing as a primary cause of the crises in the cities. Such developments as Co-op City exemplify what can be done when there is a commitment for moderate-cost housing. Unfortunately, it is a lone example in a period when such developments should be commonplace.

The problems of the cities are not just a matter of eliminating slums and creating an adequate supply of all kinds of housing, although these are vital factors. Jobs, training, integration. education, pollution of water and air and mass transportation are all elements of the total problem. Unfortunately, the kind of will needed to deal with these issues has not been demonstrated by either government or private enterprise on a meaningful scale.

Talk about creating model cities, eliminating slums and providing decent housing led to high expectations, but Congress provided only token funds. This is one reason for the crises in urban America today. People began to believe political promises that slums would be eliminated and that they would participate in programs designed to better their social and economic circumstances. But nothing much happened to change conditions. The old slums grew worse and new ones emerged. Eventually, the ghetto areas in city after city exploded. After riots in Detroit, Newark, Washington and a hundred other cities, the nation realized there was, indeed, an urban crisis.

Slogans do not eliminate slums or produce housing. Only commitment, backed by adequate resources, can get the job done. Co-op City combines both factors. This one development will cost $300 million. In comparison, the last Congress, even after the riots, allocated only $625 million for the model cities program for the entire nation!

The federal budget reflects national priorities and programs. With 70 percent of the population living in urban areas, urban programs are budgeted to receive half the amount designated for agricultural programs. As the New York Times said, "a visitor from outer space would conclude that ours is still a rural society." It is even more difficult for many people to understand how in a period of crises in our cities, we can justify spending billions of dollars a year on space exploration.

The space program, however, illustrates what the nation is capable of achieving when it is committed and willing to spend its resources for a specific program. With the same commitment and dedication directed toward solving urban problems, it would be possible to achieve the objectives of slumless cities and decent homes for all. But the task of eliminating the causes of the urban crises will not be achieved overnight, no matter how much money is spent. Neither is the urban crisis separate and distinct from the rural crisis. Conditions in the hamlets of Alabama, Mississippi, South Carolina and Louisiana have a direct bearing on conditions in Chicago, New York, Detroit, Boston and every major city of the nation.

Neither private enterprise, nor federal, state or local governments alone are going to solve these complex problems. There is a need for a comprehensive cooperative approach by all segments of society. There is no question that if the public and private sectors combine their resources and efforts in a cooperative endeavor, it would be possible within a period of decades to eliminate many causes of the urban crisis.

Trade unionists have learned the value of organizing themselves as producers. Many workers have also learned the value of organizing their purchasing power as consumers in cooperatives. The combined efforts of trade unions and cooperatives, with some assistance from government, has made it possible for many people to help themselves obtain good housing at modest cost. This effective partnership should be expanded to help resolve the housing situation.

The lesson to be learned from Co-Op City is that, through effective partnership and commitment, it is possible to build the largest cooperative community in the world and to provide people with good housing at a reasonable cost. It is not an investment in real estate but an investment in people—young and old, black and white, not only for the present, but for the future.

The primary concern in planning Co-op City was planning a quality environment for the development of human relations among people. We do not subscribe to the theory that people become frustrated, alienated or dehumanized by the size or shapes of buildings.

What is important is for people to have the opportunity to live in dignity and self-respect with their neighbors; to create an atmosphere for brotherhood and a happy relationship among people; to provide an opportunity for people to grow and enrich their lives socially and culturally. This is the real meaning and purpose of Co-op City. And this has been the meaning of other cooperative communities.

The Rising Price of Money

by Elizabeth R. Jager

Small hikes in extra interest charges—the price of borrowing money—have added extra hundreds or thousands of dollars to the yearly expenses of every family, millions to businessmen's expenses and billions to outlays of federal, state and local governments.

Most of the extra cost is hidden but interest rates affect every price in the economy. Businessmen borrow to build new factories, to buy raw materials, to pay for overhead. Retail stores borrow to buy goods from factories and stock their inventories. At each stage of production and sales, higher interest paid for borrowed money adds a link in a chain of higher costs until the consumer pays the final price.

Interest rates also affect government spending. When interest rates and prices rise, the cost of running government goes up because government must pay more to borrow money and must pay more for the goods it buys. The interest on the federal debt has mounted to $14 billion in the 1968 budget and is earmarked at almost $16 billion for 1970. This is almost four times the budget cost of public welfare spending, half again as much as will be spent on medicare, double the cost of veterans' benefits and services and double the amount allocated for education and manpower.

Like business, the government can to a certain extent "pass on" the higher cost of interest rates to the taxpayer. Thus the ordinary consumers around the nation feel the impact more than any other group.

ELIZABETH R. JAGER is an economist in the AFL-CIO Department of Research.

In national economic terms, the cost of higher interest can be crippling in the short run and inflationary in the long run. Housing is hurt first and hardest from high interest rate and scarce-credit policies. Builders who cannot get scarce credit at any price are forced out of business. Other businesses find they cannot afford the high price of money and shut down. Jobs are lost. The jobs that go first belong to those who are the most serious concern of today's policymakers—the poor, the unskilled, the non-white, those least likely to be employed.

In the Spring of 1969, however, the nation's money managers again boosted interest rates and tightened credit. In April, the Federal Reserve upped the rate which banks have to pay for loans from the Fed—the discount rate—to 6 percent, the highest since 1929. The objective is to stop the inflation fueled by a business investment boom.

The theory is that higher costs of money will make it too expensive to borrow, investors will slow their expansion in building new factories, consumers will curtail their buying and the economy will cool off. Then, so the theory goes, interest rates will fall and the economy can move forward on an even keel.

For nearly 20 years, this approach has been adding a growing burden to the nation's economic progress. Ever since the early 1950s, interest costs have been raised to increase the cost of borrowing and stem inflation by slowing down the economy. There have been recessions in 1954, 1958, 1960-1961 and a slowdown in 1967. But the long-term price of money has

The cost of borrowing has never receded to low levels, prices have not come down. Each time the nation finds itself on a new plateau of higher rates after billions in lost production, high job losses and suffering among those least able to afford the economic impact—the home buyers, workers and consumers.

In brief, the policy of raising interest rates represents a short-run, misplaced effort which produces long-run distortions. In 1969, the policy of raising interest rates once again has set the stage for potentially worse problems for the economy.

The Higher Cost of Higher Interest

"It's come to be very difficult for a person to finance a first home unless he has a wealthy relative to stake him," according to a West Coast banker quoted recently in the Wall Street Journal.

Most Americans are finding that "it's come to be very difficult" to meet the cost of living. One reason for the constant rise in living costs is the built-in, long-term cost of higher interest rates due to the policies of the nation's money managers.

For most people in need of homes, buying a house is a formidable venture and rents also are rising. For example, in 1969, a Viet Nam veteran may find $20,000 mortgages rather typical as housing prices zoom upward. Even Veterans Administration and Federal Housing Administration rates have been lifted to 7½ percent, with insurance charges boosting the effective rate to 8 percent. This means monthly payments of $150 on a 30-year mortgage, not including taxes. The total cost to repay a $20,000 mortgage grows to $53,000 over 30 years.

In 1952, a Korean war veteran could find a house with a $10,000 mortgage at a 4 percent rate. The monthly payments were less than $50 and interest and mortgage costs totaled about $17,000 during the 30-year "life" of the mortgage.

In 17 years, only 4 extra percentage points show up in the mortgage rate—from 4 percent to 8 percent—and the price of the house has risen to where the mortgage required has doubled from $10,000 to $20,000. But total costs have more than tripled. Thus doubling the rate and doubling the mortgage have more than tripled the costs to the homebuyer.

And interest charges helped to raise the price of the typical mortgage from $10,000 to $20,000 because builders borrow money to buy land and materials, pay workers, etc., and usually pass the cost of added interest charges on in higher prices to the homebuyer. Manufacturers of building materials borrow money to run their factories and pass on the extra costs of borrowed money to the builders—and so the chain goes.

The higher long-term costs are obscured, however, because the average man tends to base his decision on the monthly payment and not the total cost. Many people know that the longer it takes to pay back a loan, the higher the total cost to the borrower. But few people realize how much.

THE RISING COST OF A $20,000 MORTGAGE LOAN*

*Principal and interest payments only.

The rate of 6 percent of the past few years meant that a $20,000 mortgage cost $34,388 in 20 years and $43,168 in 30 years. At 8 percent, the same mortgage for 30 years adds $10,000 to the costs, for total payments of $52,832. The change from 6 percent to 8 percent between 1966 and 1968 meant a percentage cost hike of 22 percent in only a few years, just for added interest payments.

In a country where average wages are $3 an hour for factory workers—a yearly income of $6,000—most private houses have moved out of reach in recent years. Even if a man and his wife work full-time at average hourly factory rates, their combined income would be $12,000. A recent Department of Labor budget study, based on prices in 1967, showed that an income of $13,000 in 1967 was the appropriate level for a family budget to carry a $20,000 house.

Rents also rise because of higher interest because builders must pay higher rates on money borrowed to build apartments and on mortgage costs. These extra costs are passed on to apartment dwellers in the form of higher rents. The result is more luxury apartments and not enough apartments geared to the paychecks of most Americans.

Car prices have changed, too, and partially because of interest payments. Unlike mortgage rates, auto loan rates at commercial banks showed very little change in the 1950s and early 1960s. In the same way, however, the overall impact is greater than it looks. In Washington, D. C., for example, one bank lent money at a 4 percent rate from the early 1950s until 1966, when the rate was changed to 4½ percent and then to 5 percent in 1969. Actual rates were much higher because bank loans for cars tend to be "add-on" or "discount" installment arrangements, which cost the borrower effective rates at much higher levels. But the result was similar—the cost of cars was higher, the length of time to repay loans tended to be stretched from 2 years in the early 1950s to 3 years by the 1960s and the stated 4 percent to 5 percent change in interest charges meant a rise in effective rates—including add-ons—from over 7 percent to over 9 percent. The change adds only a few dollars more to monthly payments, but totals $60 extra in 3 years.

The Long-term Record—An Upward Seesaw

The record shows that the major effect of repeated efforts to slow down the rise in demand for goods and services through higher interest rates has meant an ever higher cost. The discount rate has seesawed upward and built ever higher interest charges into the economy.

During World War II and the postwar expansion, the Federal Reserve followed a policy of keeping a low discount rate—the basic interest rate the Federal Reserve charges for loans to commercial banks. (The Fed has three major means of affecting interest rates; the discount rate is only one, but all of them interact.) In the early 1950s, Federal Reserve policies were changed because most economists believed the Fed's practices were inflationary. But from 1950 until 1953, discount rates moved up from 1½ percent to 2 percent. Recession followed, with unemployment rising to 5.5 percent. The same medicine was prescribed as the economy moved up and another recession occurred in 1958. Once more, in 1959, the discount rate was raised, followed by recession and rising unemployment. As the 1960s started with recession, 10 years of "anti-inflationary" changes had raised the discount rate—the basic cost of money to the banks—by 100 percent. The discount rate was 1½ percent in 1950 and 3 percent in 1960.

In the early 1960s, unemployment stayed high while the economy moved up, but the nation's balance of payments problem was used as the reason for keeping the discount rate at or above the 3 percent level. U.S. interest rates could not be allowed to move too low, it was claimed, or investors would send their money abroad to seek higher returns and foreigners would remove their investments from the United States. This would bring the nation even worse problems in its financial standing, it was argued.

But in 1965, even with the high starting point, the discount rate was hiked again—to 4½ percent "to stop inflation." The housing crisis and mini-recession of 1966-7 followed. Production fell off. Employment moved down. Prices continued up. Then the Fed started the upward trend of interest rates again and in April 1969 finally raised the discount rate to the 1929 level—6 percent, a 300 percent rise above 1950.

The Federal Reserve thus proved what the AFL-CIO, Congressman Wright Patman (D-Texas) and others who have favored low interest rates have always said: The policies of the Federal Reserve Board, charged by law with providing smooth supplies of money and credit to an expanding economy, have failed to try to keep interest rates low enough so that most Americans will not suffer from the nation's money policies; banker domination and banker orientation fail to serve the nation's needs.

The Fed claims it merely influences the supply of money and the price of interest, but cannot control either one. That is true. The Fed has three weapons —the discount rate, the amount of reserves it requires banks to keep against deposits, and its buying and selling of securities in the open market. Meanwhile, many financial institutions—savings and loans, life insurance companies, etc.—and other money markets affect the upward price of interest.

But the Federal Reserve does not try to move interest rates down. Instead, its policies have encouraged the rising interest rate trend.

In short, the thinking of the nation's money managers is geared to higher interest rates. The problem is not that the Fed tries to force rates up, but that its policy blocks efforts to try to keep interest rates as low as possible for the needs of most Americans.

The Prime Rate—Bankers' Minimum Wage

While criticism of Federal Reserve policies has mounted throughout the past 20 years, much less attention has been paid to another basic lending rate, the so-called prime rate charged by the nation's leading banks to their blue ribbon customers. After the "prime rate" reached 7½ percent in March of 1969, the Fed raised the discount rate in April and many experts predicted another rise in the prime rate.

The prime rate—which is not set by legal authority but by the private action of big banks—has seesawed upward in the past 20 years at a higher rate than the discount level. Obviously, if the banks must pay the discount rate to borrow from the Fed, they must charge their customers a higher rate because interest rates mean income to the banks.

The trend is upward. Starting at 2 percent in the early 1950s, it moved to 5 percent before the 1954 recession, then back up to 4½ percent before the recession of 1958 and up again to 5 percent before the 1960-61 recession. In the 1960s, the prime rate never dropped below 4½ percent.

Thus in 10 years the basic lending rate of major banks had more than doubled—125 percent higher in the early 1960s than its level 10 years before. And it has zoomed upward in the past few years. By March 1969, the prime interest rate—which the banks charge their richest blue ribbon borrowers—was 275 percent higher than in the early 1950s.

The prime rate is as basic as the discount rate because banks scale many other rates upward from that level. Mortgage rates and many other interest charges tend to be higher—as less credit-worthy borrowers or less rapidly repayable loans must pay interest rates above the basic charge geared to the banks' needs for return on their loans.

This rate is "competitive" only in the sense that it goes up when the demand for loans is high and down when economic slowdowns occur in borrowing. The bankers do not compete with one another on the prime rate. The prime rate sets the floor—a minimum wage set by the banks to protect their incomes.

The key big banks set the prime rate and the nation's other banks follow the leader. So the big banks set their own minimum wage—without negotiations with their customers or government legislation.

In "Floors and Ceilings," published in the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank Review in May of 1966, Federal Reserve Board Governor George Mitchell raised the question of why the bankers did not compete:

"Ceiling rates on loans are established by law. But floors on rates are set by the policy of bankers. The prime rate, for example, establishes the rate at which loans are made to the 'best' customers of the banks—that is, the large, well-established firms, which have the least risk of default."

Competition? The prime rate started in the Depression because competition was so much of a problem for the banks.

"The establishment of a nationwide prime rate," Governor Mitchell explains, "came in the 1930s when a very liquid banking system faced a greatly reduced loan demand. The combination of banks seeking loans and of customers who were well aware of the large number of available banking alternatives kept downward pressure on loan rates. In an effort to protect themselves from erosion of yields by these competitive forces, banks began to follow the lead of a few large banks who simply announced a floor rate below which they would not lend. Rates were scaled up from this minimum for less prime customers and stability in yields was thus assured. Borrowers were supposed to be happy because they knew they were paying the lowest rate available. Lenders were supposed to be content since they knew they competitively could not charge more than the going rate, and if they charged less they would simply cause all other banks to join them and hence they would 'spoil the market.'"

Thus the bankers started to set their own minimum wage in the 1930s. No competition for lower rates exists. The price of money is pegged not by law but by policies of private bankers who claim that "demand" and the "market" forced them to raise the prime rate to unprecedented heights in 1969.

"The kind of price-fixing inherent in the prime rate," Governor Mitchell comments, "contravenes some of the key virtues that we associate with competitive market enterprise . . .

"One could almost say it is downright discriminatory to fight inflation with monetary restraint so long as the prime rate is holding the credit door invitingly open to the biggest borrowers in the business."

But in March 1969, the banks raised the prime rate to 7½ percent and, with discounts, to over 9 percent.

While the banker-dominated policies of the Federal Reserve System and the bankers' price-fixing of a floor under rates continue to help drive interest rates upward, the nation seems to be awakening in 1969 to just how discriminatory and dangerous high interest rate policies have become.

The Business and Banking Bonanza

The large and medium-sized corporations feel the impact of high interest rates last, least and often only temporarily. They are the cause of the current inflationary boom, as business borrowing has zoomed upward. Business outlays for plants and machines in 1969 were expected to increase 14 percent over 1968, despite ever higher interest rates. The Fed's answer to slow the boom: higher interest rates and scarcer credit. By the time such a policy can reach the corporations, many more homebuilders, homebuyers, workers and others will feel the brunt of high-interest rate policies. Before the policy "works," the nation may be on its way to recession. Meanwhile, profits for big business and banks have soared upward in the 1960s while other groups have failed to match or barely kept up with the ever-rising spiral in costs.

Why haven't higher interest rates stopped big corporate investment? There are several reasons:

- Rich firms can get loans at the lowest interest rate—the prime rate—when others cannot borrow at any price or at much higher interest rates. The prime rate's purpose is to give the best customers the first chance at scarce credit. Others can get the leavings, if any, at high cost.
- Tax policies help make credit cheaper for corporations than for consumers since the interest costs are tax deductible as a cost of doing business.
- The 7 percent investment credit and double depreciation for new construction have spurred investment and reduced the cost of higher interest even further. This 7 percent tax credit is a government subsidy of business investment in new equipment and machines, thus spurring investment and cheapening the cost of interest for the corporation. Fast write-offs reduce the interest-cost impact even further.
- Business can pass on the higher interest costs in higher prices. Profits after taxes zoomed 91 percent between 1960 and 1968.
- The cash-flow from higher prices, plus tax depreciation write-offs, helps corporations to have enough money to pay for much expansion without borrowing money. When they have to borrow, the substantial cash-flow means the debt (at higher interest) can be paid back more rapidly, thus making the impact temporary on the big corporation.

As Business Week reported on March 22, 1969: ". . . whatever their motive for capital spending, big companies are agreeing on one vital point: The financing needed to carry out plans is already in the bag." Unlike the homebuyer whose income will not allow him to pay back a mortgage in less than 30 years because he can't afford higher monthly payments, the corporation has higher income from higher prices, depreciation write-offs and huge deductions from taxes.

Thus higher interest rates, when charged, can be taken care of quickly. "We look for sufficient payback so that cash-flow will pay for capital improvement. If we do increase our debt in the process, it will be a very temporary increase," said one major corporate executive in the same issue of Business Week.

For banks, the upward climb of interest rates has meant a real bonanza. In the past five years, the nation's largest banks averaged a profit growth rate of 8 percent a year. Between 1967 and 1968 alone, these profits jumped 11 percent. And first quarter 1969 reports from leading banks show a great range, with some having 28 percent higher profits than the first quarter of the year before.

As bankers and well-to-do corporations continue to avoid the impact of Fed policies and hike their profits, government regulations seem less and less effective in an ever more complicated world. New loopholes are reported daily. Those who are causing the investment spree are hurting least, last and only temporarily.

For those hurt first, worst and for a long time—the average American and the national economy—discrimination takes many forms. Even legal ceilings on rates payable to savers benefit the well-off much more than the ordinary saver. The Fed sets the rates banks may pay depositors. In the 1960s, this rate moved upward from 3 percent to 6¼ percent for some deposits of $100,000 or more and to over 5 percent for others. But for the man with a savings account, the rate merely moved from 3 percent to 4 percent. Meanwhile, the "prime rate," the basic rate for income to the banks on the money they lend, has moved from a prime rate of 4 percent to 7½ percent.

Again, the cry for "market competition" urges removal of all ceiling rates in 1969 because the money lenders do not want a legal ceiling, even though they set their own floor.

The AFL-CIO pointed out to the Congress the "terrible price" the nation pays. In 1968, the Housing and Urban Development Act included a suspension of the legal ceiling on FHA mortgages until October 1969. In the interim, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development can change the rate so the mortgage lenders can "attract" money into the mortgage market.

"We note with considerable concern," the AFL-CIO said then, "the proposal that the statutory limit of 6 percent on all VA and FHA mortgages be eliminated and that the interest rate be set by the Housing and Urban Development Secretary.

"The argument is made that unless the limit is raised, there will not be any great flow of mortgage money and many of the programs within this bill will lie fallow, even if enacted.

"In effect, we are being told that the interest rate is being held hostage and all of us who are inherently opposed to high interest rates are expected to surrender as the price of realizing any mass building programs.

"If a higher interest rate were to produce more money and more dwellings, we might at least understand why some non-bankers support the proposal, knowing the terrible price that will very shortly have to be paid throughout our economy. That terrible price, we are convinced, will be an across-the-board upward movement in all money costs, be they the cost of borrowing for a car or other consumer items or the cost of borrowing by the U.S. Treasury or the state and local governments.

"The added interest will hit us all many times over. Very soon a new higher plateau of interest rates will be established, cancelling out any temporary advantage enjoyed by the higher mortgage interest rates. Within a matter of months, new pressures would generate another rise in the mortgage interest rates and the movement would be under way again to move the whole interest rate structure to a still higher plateau."

Unfortunately, labor's warning to Congress has proven prophetic as interest rates have continued their upward climb, at a heavy cost for the consumer, the businessman and government at every level.

NEW BOOKS

Rebel Voices—An I.W.W. Anthology

Edited, with introductions, by Joyce L. Kornbluh. Paperback AA 139, The University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor, Mich. Third printing, 1968. 419 pp. $4.95. In original clothbound edition, $12.50.

In a period when the nation is being reminded that nothing is more American than protest, this book offers a good look at another period of turmoil and perhaps some perspective on our occasionally turbulent history. In Mrs. Kornbluh's words, "This anthology is an attempt to bring together the history of the I.W.W. as told by the Wobblies themselves. It is a story of their strikes, free-speech fights, trials and riots, of militancy and martyrdom, of sacrifices and suppression, of epic struggles for a One Big Union and a Cooperative Commonwealth which would be free of class and nationality distinctions." This book proved popular when it first appeared in hardcover, but it was expensive. This paperback edition now makes it more widely available.

NEW PAMPHLETS

Adjusting to Automation

AFL-CIO Publication No. 144. Available from AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20006. January 1969. 36 pp. Single copies free.

As automation and increasing mechanization have swept through the economy, unions have attempted to ease and humanize the impact through collective bargaining. This publication consists of seven articles which first appeared in the American Federationist. They deal with specific approaches developed by unions in recent years: "Protecting Job Rights Through Attrition Clauses;" "Easing Job Changes by Advance Notice;" "SUB: Closing the Wage Loss Gap;" "The Transfer Rights of Displaced Workers;" "Severance Pay: Cushion at Job's End;" "The Quickening Trend Towards Early Retirement;" "The Shorter Workweek Trend." The articles have been revised to take account of recent bargaining advances.

Man and His Environment

AFL-CIO Publication No. 143. Available from AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., NW, Washington, D.C. 20006. January 1969. 26 pp. Single copies free.

There is a growing realization in America that the rampant growth of this nation must become a thing of the past, that an urbanized population must pay more attention to conserving the nation's resources than exploiting them, that there must be developed a sounder relationship between man and his environment. This publication presents labor's positions in several areas—the crisis in land use, the fight for clean air, the water crisis and the energy revolution. These updated articles first appeared in the American Federationist.

Security in Time of Need

AFL-CIO Publication No. 145. Available from AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., NW, Washington, D.C. 20006. March 1969. 32 pp. Single copies free.

The Social Security Act of 1935 was a landmark in social welfare for this nation. It laid the foundation for a system which would help people in need as a matter of right, based on the Constitution's empowering the federal government to provide for the general welfare. This publication, prepared by the AFL-CIO Department of Social Security, describes in detail the major components of the social security system: Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance; Public Welfare; Workmen's Compensation; Unemployment Insurance; Health Programs. With the aid of charts, the background and coverage of each program are made clear. The problems and weaknesses in each area are described, along with labor's recommendations for improvement. After reviewing the programs designed to deal with some of the difficult problems of modern life—retirement, disability, unemployment, sickness, poverty—the publication concludes with labor's hope that the nation will move on to complete a social welfare structure which has proven its worth.

Women and American Trade Unions

By Alice H. Cook. New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y. 8 pages. Single copies free.

With more women working longer and more women joining unions, one would expect that the role of women in union life would have become more prominent. The author of this study points out that women are largely found in secondary leadership positions on the local level and seldom reach national leadership posts. In fact, she says, less attention is being paid to the special needs and problems of women union members than was the case earlier in the century. This study examines contract provisions for women workers and the effect recent federal legislation on "equality" has had on women's opportunities in the shops and the attitude of unions toward handling the kinds of grievances and demands arising under Title VII and the Equal Pay Act.

Why Not Be a Medical Technologist?

U.S. Department of Labor. Available from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 10 cents.

This attractive leaflet is one of a series of "Careers for Women" leaflets which has just been issued by the U.S. Department of Labor. Most of the questions a high school student would ask are clearly answered—what does the job consist of, what kinds of jobs are available in the field, what qualifications are needed, how much can one earn, what skills and aptitudes are necessary? Unions working with high school students can obtain other materials on career opportunities from the Department of Labor.

Focus on Community Action

Report of the National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity. Available from U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 58 pages. 35 cents.

This report on the poverty program briefly reviews the reasons for the existence of poverty in this affluent nation and the programs designed to help people break out of the poverty cycle. Recognizing that community action programs are the most misunderstood aspect of the war on poverty, this report describes the organization and development of a variety of programs which help the community fight illiteracy, unemployment, poor health, bad housing and other problems perpetuating poverty. The relationship of the community action agency to the governing structure in the community is discussed along with amendments adopted by Congress.

How to Conduct a Community Action Meeting

New Jersey Community Action Training Institute, 2465 South Broad St., Trenton, N.J. 20 pages. Single copy free; additional copies, 25 cents.

Whether it's an anti-poverty group or a union local, one of the first steps toward efficient operation is learning how to conduct an orderly meeting. Realizing this, the New Jersey community action training program has adapted the AFL-CIO's "How to Run a Union Meeting" to meet their needs. Union members serving on community action boards will want to obtain copies for their officers.

What Everyone Should Know About the Constitution of the U.S.

Channing L. Bete Company, Greenfield, Mass. 24 pages. 50 cents; over 100 copies, 30 cents each.

With the constantly raging debate over states' rights, the extent of presidential powers and the role of the Supreme Court, it may be helpful to re-examine the basic document that established the U.S. form of government. This attractively illustrated pamphlet contains the entire text of the Constitution and the 25 amendments, with marginal notes and illustrations clarifying and interpreting the various provisions.

The Responsibility of Candor

By Edward P. Morgan. International Labor Press Association, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. 12 pages. 20 cents.

One of America's leading journalists discusses the need for greater frankness and courage among journalists who cover the news in all media. In a speech to the ILPA which is reproduced in this pamphlet, Edward P. Morgan discusses the special vulnerability of public broadcasting with its "low calorie diet of tiny appropriations" to retribution from the special interests. Morgan cited several cases in his recent experience as news director for the non-commercial Public Broadcast Laboratories.

Labor Breakthrough in the Southern Classroom

League for Industrial Democracy. Available from AFL-CIO Department of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006. 48 pages. Single copy free.

A breakthrough in having the role of the labor movement discussed on a southern university campus was achieved when the University of Virginia offered a course on organized labor in the spring of 1968. Course materials and lecturers were largely assembled by the LID, which initiated this pilot project. A three-day institute on labor's role in the South also was held on campus, bringing together union, civil rights and anti-poverty workers to discuss economic and social issues in this "right-to-work" state. The accomplishments in breaking down stereotypes and anti-labor attitudes in the two projects are recorded in this booklet by the instructors, labor leaders who participated in the session and in an evaluation of the course written by the students.

Clean Water—It's Up to You

Izaak Walton League of America, 1326 Waukegan Rd., Glenview, Ill. 48 pages. Free.

Water pollution threatens the health of many communities. It closes beaches and poisons fish, waterfowl and other wild creatures. It jeopardizes farms, factories and business investments. This pamphlet is designed to equip the concerned citizen with ideas and tools to fight for water quality standards and see that standards are enforced. This is a how-to-do-it pamphlet which will help citizens get the facts, check local standards and enforcement, make use of federal assistance programs, join with other community groups to promote this vital cause and elect candidates who will give leadership on the problem. "A Citizen Action Checklist" is included to help interested citizens get a program under way.

. . . AND RECORDS

Martin Luther King, Jr. at Local 1199

Produced by Moe Foner. Monaural LP. Available from Local 1199, Drug and Hospital Union, RWDSU, 709 Eighth Ave., New York, N. Y. 10036. $4.95.

Just a few weeks before he was assassinated in Memphis, Martin Luther King addressed a Local 1199 rally. This memorial record opens and closes with King's "I've Been to the Mountain Top" speech and includes highlights from other speeches and sermons. Proceeds go to Local 1199's Brotherhood Fund.

MEMO: No. 8-69
June 4, 1969

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

A MAJOR FULL EMPLOYMENT BILL IS INTRODUCED

A job for every American who wants to work is the goal of a major piece of legislation introduced in the House last week.

Representatives of nearly 40 of our participating organizations attended the press conference at which Rep. James O'Hara (D., Mich.) made the measure public on behalf of himself and the more than 100 fellow House members who joined him as co-sponsors.

The bill (introduced in 5 identical measures, H.R. 11620,-21,-22, -23,-24) simply titled "The Manpower Act" was referred to the House Education and Labor Committee. Once the date for public hearings is set we shall announce it.

Jobs: Public and Private

The principal purpose of The Manpower Act is stated on the title page: "to assure an opportunity for employment to every American seeking work and to make available the education and training needed by any persons to qualify for employment consistent with his highest potential and capability."

The bill has three main features:

1. It would consolidate some nine existing job training programs into a single program administered by the Secretary of Labor. The sponsors hope in this way to permit the government to respond more flexibly to the needs of the unemployed and the labor market. The programs consolidated are those specified in the Manpower Development and Training Act and Part 1(b) of the Economic Opportunity Act.

2. It would create a completely new program designed to encourage employers to train their present employees for higher-skilled, better-paying jobs - and by upgrading them, create more job openings at the entry-levels of their industries. Ninety percent of the cost of approved upgrading programs would be paid by the government. Bonuses would be awarded to employers whose programs resulted in "substantial upgrading and high retention."

3. The Secretary of Labor would be empowered to contract with any Federal, state or local governmental agency, or with any private nonprofit organization for work that would absorb into public service employment those who have not found places in private industry. This program would bring the unskilled into community improvement projects in health, education, public safety, recreation, beautification, etc. It would seek to provide them with the training they need to move on into regular private or public employment.

There is no price tag on the Manpower Act. It would authorize the appropriation of sums needed to accomplish its objectives. It does not specify how many jobs its programs will create. Mr. O'Hara said at the press conference that he forsees a first-year target of 200,000 jobs in the public and non-profit sectors; the future extent of the program would depend on the ability of private industry to provide jobs for those looking for work.

What Participating Organizations Can Do

Leadership Conference organizations interested in supporting the Manpower Act can help in several ways:

1. Familiarize yourself with the bill. Copies can be obtained from the House Document Room, Capitol, Washington, D. C. by simply asking for the bill by number.

2. Enclosed with this MEMO is a list of the House members who, as of this date, have joined in sponsoring the bill. If you find your Congressman's name among them, by all means commend him. If he is not on the list, urge him to become a sponsor.

This bill would go far toward meeting the goal set forth in the statement adopted at the annual meeting of the Leadership Conference Board in which we urged Congress "to enact a massive employment program that will create socially useful jobs in both the public and private sectors of the economy."

LANDMARK HEARINGS ON THE "POWERLESSNESS" OF FARM LABOR GET UNDERWAY

An inquiry into the "powerlessness" of migrant and seasonal farm workers is being conducted by the Senate Subcommittee on Migratory Labor. The far-ranging hearings, according to the Subcommittee Chairman Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) will "explore the depth to which migrant workers are powerless to influence decisions in their base communities and so-called 'user states.' The degree to which and the way in which migrant and seasonal farm workers are deprived of political power and economic power, deprived of cultural identity or pride, deprived of the rights and privileges that most Americans take for granted."

The tentative hearing dates are as follows:

June 9 and 10: "Who Are the Migrants?"
July 14 and 15: "Efforts in Community and Union Organization"
July 28: "Migrant Subculture" (The witness will be Dr. Robert Coles)
July 29: "The Effects of Pesticides on Farm Workers"
August 7 and 8: "Legal Problems of Migrants"

Additional hearings in September and October will explore limitations of present government service programs and social and worker benefit programs; employment and manpower programs; the nature and scope of rural employment; and the future of migrant and seasonal farm workers.

We urge our Washington representatives to try and attend these hearings. The time and place of the hearings can be obtained by calling the Subcommittee, CA 4-3121, ext. 4538.

Ethics

Some Senators and Congressmen are living in glass houses when they denounce the ethical conduct, or misconduct, of some of our Supreme Court Justices. Or, so it seems to an increasing body of citizens.

Most trade union members would agree that an annual salary of $60,000 a year is a stately income. It should be enough to permit a Supreme Court Justice to keep body and soul together without outside fees from any source whatsoever.

But what of a United States Senator who gets only $42,500 plus travel, plus office, plus help, plus, plus, plus?

Should a Senator who serves on the Judiciary Committee profit from his partnership in a private law firm that represents clients in cases before Federal Judges whose appointment was approved by that Judiciary Committee?

Should a Senator who serves on the Armed Forces Appropriations Subcommittee profit from ownership of large blocs of stock in defense corporations?

Should a Senator who serves on the Finance Committee passing on laws to regulate banks and other saving institutions be an officer or important stockholder in a private bank or savings and loan institution?

Should Senators who vote Federal subsidies to farmers for not working their land be allowed to collect such subsidies for owning farms they don't work?

The same questions could be asked of Congressmen. The only difference is that for the first time this year, members of the House have been required—by their own vote—to report outside income. Senators have a gentler law under which they divulge speaking fees and such honorariums.

The question of ethics of public servants has been raised and quite properly. Now, let's make sure that a single standard is applied to all three branches of Government—the Courts, the Executive and the Congress.

It's time some of those questions were answered.

Appeal

More than 1,000 IAM members on National Airlines have been locked out, and fired for four and a half months from their jobs at Miami, New York City, Newark and Philadelphia.

These men are fighting a battle not only for themselves and their families, but for every member of the IAM. If an employer under IAM contract can ignore the union contract, evade Federal laws governing bargaining and escape without penalty, no IAM member is safe on his job.

Fortunately, National Airlines is not likely to get away with it. The union has put its case against National before the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It has also brought the National Mediation Board into U.S. District Court at Washington, D.C., for its prolongation of useless mediation efforts. These legal efforts should bear fruit, but they take time.

Meanwhile, more than 1,000 union members and their families are barely subsisting on $25 a week strike benefits, plus food chits provided by contributions to their Lockout Fund. Donations are urgently needed on a continuing basis. Every IAM local has received an officially endorsed appeal. Make checks payable to A. C. Carter, Secretary-Treasurer, IAM District 145, 801 W. 49the St., Hialeah, Fla. 33012. It will be money well spent.

A NEW THREAT TO SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

The Federal guidelines for the desegregation of Southern public schools, under steady Dixiecrat attack in Congress, are now confronted by a new threat. This time high government officials are considering moves which would weaken them.

A perceptive story in the Washington Post last Friday describes the situation. We enclose a copy. We urge you to read it and this MEMO and start writing: to the President and to HEW Secretary Robert H. Finch, protesting this latest attempt to thwart the law and proper enforcement of it.

A Move To Abolish Deadlines

The immediate target in the new campaign is the provision in the guidelines that would require most Southern school districts to come up with acceptable desegregation plans by the start of the 1969-70 school year in September, or face a cut-off of Federal funds.

When representatives of the Leadership Conference met with Secretary Finch on March 16, the matter of the deadline was raised. The representatives felt they received assurances from Mr. Finch that the deadline would be respected and the guidelines would not be rewritten.

Now, according to reports and stories like the one in the Post, it appears that HEW's new General Counsel, Robert C. Mardian, and Jerris Leonard, head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, are drafting a statement that would abolish any deadline. Southern school districts that have been resisting desegregation for 15 years would be given an indefinite time in which to come into compliance with the law.

This move can only stiffen resistance to the laws of Congress and to the decisions of the Supreme Court, which declared in Green v. New Kent County, that each school board must "come forward with a (desegregation) plan that promises realistically to work, and promises realistically to work now." (Emphasis in the original.) If this change in policy takes place, school officials in districts that have already complied with the law are going to suffer. These officials, who have simply done what the law requires, will very likely be attacked for giving in too early.

South Carolina Was The Tipoff

The first sign that the administration was easing away from strict enforcement of the guidelines came earlier this month. On June 2, HEW made public the desegregation plans it had developed for 21 school districts in South Carolina, Strom Thurmond country. These districts were under court order to desegregate promptly. HEW gave 18 of the 21 until the 1970-71 school year to desegregate instead of holding them to its own 1969-70 deadline.

Encouraged by this sign of leniency, other districts in South Carolina and elsewhere in the South - districts that have come up with acceptable plans for eliminating their dual school systems this year or next - are petitioning HEW for more time. They are using the treatment of the 21 districts as their precedent.

What You Must Do

Roy Wilkins, chairman of the Leadership Conference, responded to the news of the new threat to the guidelines by writing to the President. He asked for an opportunity to meet with Mr. Nixon before any change in the guidelines is made. He warned that if it were necessary to bring suits against the government to stop erosion of the school desegregation program, "we are prepared to bring them." The text of that letter is enclosed with this MEMO.

Please write your own. Write or wire President Nixon, urging him to stop this new attempt to weaken enforcement. But you must act at once. The new policy statement may be coming out any day now.

And send copies of your letter to HEW Secretary Robert H. Finch, c/o Department of Health, Education and Welfare, 330 Independence Avenue, S. W., Washington, D. C. and to U. S. Attorney General John Mitchell, c/o Department of Justice, 10th & Pennsylvania Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C.

The matter is urgent. You cannot act too quickly.

DRIVE FOR 1969 CIVIL RIGHTS LAW PICKS UP MOMENTUM

The campaign for new civil rights legislation in this Congress began to quicken last week. Senate sponsors of the omnibus civil rights bill (S. 2029) introduced earlier this session, (see MEMO: No. 7-69) reintroduced the four sections of that measure as separate bills.

You may remember the same approach was used in the last Congress in order to speed Committee consideration of the component parts of the civil rights package.

The four bills and their new numbers are:

1. S. 2453 - A bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, principally by giving it power to issue cease-and-desist orders against violators, should its efforts at conciliation fail;

2. S. 2454 - A bill to guarantee that juries in state court trials are chosen without discrimination as to race, creed, color, sex, national origin or economic status;

3. S. 2455 - A bill to remove the ceiling on appropriations for the U. S. Civil Rights Commission. (The existing law holds the appropriation to the figure approved in 1968, $2,650,000.);

4. S. 2456 - A bill to extend provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 for another five years to 1975. Without the extension, states would be free after August 1970 to reimpose restrictive voting practices.

The last three bills are the same as the comparable titles in the omnibus bill. The Equal Employment Opportunities bill was introduced in amended form. Among other things, it would extend the EEO Commission's jurisdiction to include employers of 8 or more employees as well as employees of state and local governments. And it would consolidate equal employment opportunity enforcement by transferring to EEOC the Department of Labor's Office of Federal Contract Compliance and the equal employment opportunity activities of the Civil Service Commission.

House Hearings on Voting Rights

Meanwhile, the House Judiciary Committee is continuing its hearings on a companion bill (H.R. 4249) to extend provisions of the Voting Rights Act another five years.

U. S. Attorney General John Mitchell has postponed his testimony on this legislation five times. He is scheduled to appear this Thursday, June 26. Clarence Mitchell, chairman of the Leadership Conference's Legislative Committee, is scheduled to testify at the same time. We shall report on this testimony once it is given.

Administration Eyes Softening Of Guidelines

By Peter Milius
Washington Post Staff Writer

Nixon Administration officials have drafted a policy statement that would give Southern school districts more time to desegregate than current guidelines allow.

The statement is still being argued about, and has yet to be officially adopted.

The guidelines contain desegregation deadlines. The deadline for complete desegregation in most Southern school districts is September.

There are two broad exceptions to this rule — Districts with Negro majorities and those that have to build schools before desegregating can have until September, 1970, to comply.

The proposed policy statement would simply do away with these deadlines.

The guidelines are based on Federal law as set forth by Congress and the courts.

Court Decision

One of the main bases for the 1969 and 1970 deadlines is the freedom-of-choice opinion handed down by the Supreme Court two years ago in Green v. New Kent County.

The Court rejected a freedom-of-choice plan that had not brought about much desegregation, declaring that "the burden on a school board today is to come forward with a plan that promises realistically to work, and promises realistically to work now."

Elsewhere in the same opinion the Court said desegregation plans must have "real prospects for dismantling the state-imposed dual (school) system 'at the earliest practicable date.' "

The Johnson Administration seized upon this criterion and said it meant school districts had to desegregate entirely and right away.

The proposed Nixon policy statement takes a different view. It says a school district has to file a plan right away, and that the plan must promise complete desegregation. But if circumstances warrant, it says, the desegregation itself can come in stages.

The Nixon Administration has been under heavy Southern pressure all year to relax the desegregation guidelines in return for the support the South gave Mr. Nixon last November.

On several occasions the Administration has bent the guidelines, but so far it has not broken them.

Jerris Leonard, chief of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, said yesterday that the proposed policy statement is not a retreat by the Administration.

'Where Possible'

He said that, if the statement is adopted and issued, school districts will still be required to desegregate right away "where that is possible."

"The problem," he said, "is where it's not possible."

He pointed out that Federal civil rights officials cannot get around to all the remaining Southern school districts by this September, and that "it's wrong to set an arbitrary deadline we can't meet."

The guidelines, he noted are really just a statement of policy, and have been amended before. "We're simply attempting to draft a statement to set out what the law requires," he said, "and then enforce it according to the resources available."

Leonard is one author of the proposed statement. Another is Robert C. Mardian, general counsel in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. The proposal has a good deal of support within the White House staff.

There is resistance within Leonard's own civil rights division, from HEW's Office of Civil Rights and from other aides to HEW Secretary Robert H. Finch.

Officials said yesterday they doubt the issue will be resolved before next week, when Finch returns from vacation.

TEXT OF WILKINS' LETTER TO PRESIDENT

Dear Mr. President:

Today the goal of equal education in a single school system is in peril; it now appears that the Federal government may be party to a flagrant denial of constitutional rights. News and other reports suggest that your administration is countenancing a delay. We understand the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is about to postpone the deadline for school desegregation indefinitely even though the Department's guidelines call for desegregation by the start of the school year, 1969-70. On this issue, representatives of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights were personally assured by HEW Secretary Finch on March 16, that the guidelines would not be rewritten or evaded.

Reports of the plans drafted by the Department of HEW for most of 21 school districts in South Carolina at the request of the Federal District Courts indicate the Department is ignoring its own guidelines in formulating its proposals. Under the guise of assisting the court, the Department is helping to thwart implementation of the Supreme Court's school decisions.

This is a shameful and discouraging state of affairs. If the reports are true, the Department will be betraying the trust placed in it by the Congress when it passed Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Repeatedly you have declared that your Administration is dedicated to law and order, and will not permit this evasion of the law.

There is no doubt anymore about what needs to be done. The Supreme Court in 1968 and 1969 clarified the law: desegregation must be effected in 1969; desegregation of school faculties must be effected; freedom of choice plans must be considered inadequate where they fail to bring about elimination of the dual school system.

The organizations united in the Leadership Conference are determined to stop erosion of school desegregation in the name of expediency. If this means suits against the government, we are prepared to bring them. We shall do all in our power to arouse the conscience of America to keep the nation from falling back.

Before any change in the guidelines is carried forward, we urgently request an opportunity to meet with you, Mr. President, to discuss the implications of such a move.

Respectfully,

Roy Wilkins

WE WANT TAX JUSTICE!

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR AND CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS
815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006
GEORGE MEANY, President
WM. F. SCHNITZLER, Secretary-Treasurer

Let's suppose that you and your neighbor are at the check-out counter of a supermarket. You each buy a loaf of bread. But the price to you is 30 cents, while your neighbor only has to pay 12 cents.

When you buy shoes for your youngster, you are charged $8. Your neighbor, who has exactly the same income and family responsibilities, only has to pay $3.

"How come?" you ask the store manager.

"That's the law," he replies.

If there really were such a law, you can bet it would be quickly changed. The American people wouldn't stand for such unfairness.

Yet, there are injustices just as glaring in our nation's income tax laws. Take this example:

A married worker whose sole income is $8,000 a year in wages and has a standard tax deduction will pay $1,000 in federal income tax.

But a married investor whose sole income in a year is an $8,000 profit from selling a stock or property at more than he paid for it will have to pay only $354 in federal income tax.

He pays less because the tax rate on "capital gains" is much less than the tax rate on earned income.

That's just one of many tax loopholes the AFL-CIO wants Congress to close.

Tax reform is a dollar and cents, bread and butter issue to every American family.

These tax loopholes, intended to benefit the rich, take money out of your paycheck.

If a store had to sell its shoes at less than cost to some customers, it would have to charge other customers more money to make up for the loss.

The same is true with taxes.

AFL-CIO economists figured out how much some of the most glaring tax loopholes were costing the federal government.

The answer was about $16 billion a year.

Just the one loophole we illustrated—the capital gains tax—means a loss of more than $6 billion a year in tax revenue.

Who benefits?

Well, one-third of all capital gains reported on tax returns went to persons with incomes over $100,000 a year.

Who loses?

Obviously, people whose income comes from wages and salaries. They have to pay more in taxes because the money is needed to run the government, defend the nation and carry out programs to help all the people.

If tax loopholes were closed, part of the added revenue could be used to make taxes fairer for everyone. And there would be enough left over to finance government programs that are so urgently needed.

Let's take a look at a few more of these tax loopholes.

Did you know that the government in effect pays 7 percent of the cost of new equipment or machines for a corporation? And that's in addition to the normal tax deductions allowed for business expenses and interest charges.

It's called an investment tax credit and it costs the federal treasury $3 billion a year.

Just now, the government is trying to do everything it can to cool off the economy and curb inflation. It just doesn't make sense to continue the 7 percent investment tax credit which heats up the only source of inflationary demand in the economy.

Incidentally, if you buy a new washing machine for your home, you can't subtract 7 percent of the cost from your tax bill.

But that's because you're not a corporation.

If you're not a wealthy investor, chances are that terms such as oil depletion allowance and accelerated depreciation on real estate don't mean anything to you.

But they mean that the federal government loses more than $2 billion in tax revenues each year because of those loopholes. And whose taxes do you think make up for this loss?

The Wall Street Journal gave these examples of how some people with big incomes escape taxes:

- An investor reported an income of more than $1.4 million. But by taking advantage of both the real estate depreciation loophole and the capital gains loophole, he paid no tax at all.

- Another investor, whose money came from oil, took in more than $1 million—and paid only $397 in taxes.

According to the U. S. Treasury's latest report:

21 millionaires and another 134 Americans with incomes over $200,000 paid not a penny in federal income taxes.

But, 2¼ million Americans, whose incomes are below the government's poverty level, paid $100 million in income taxes.

One way to avoid paying any federal taxes is to invest your money in state and local bonds. The interest is tax-exempt.

This provision does help cities and states sell their bonds on more favorable terms. But the federal government could subsidize one-third of the interest cost for such bonds and still come out $100 million a year ahead if this tax loophole were closed. That's one of the reforms the AFL-CIO has urged.

There are other escape hatches by which the wealthy legally evade taxes. Big corporations can spin off smaller subsidiaries for tax gains. Wealthy people find it mighty profitable to lose money on a part-time farm, even if you don't actually lose anything. Charity begins at home, if you have a good tax lawyer.

Just using part of the added revenue from closing these loopholes—$6.7 billion out of the estimated $16 billion—Congress could enact these tax reductions urged by the AFL-CIO:

1. Raise the minimum standard deduction from the present $200 plus $100 for each exemption to $600 plus $100 per exemption.

This would exempt from federal income tax most people earning below the poverty level and reduce the tax on all low-income families.

2. Increase the standard deduction from the present 10 percent with a $1,000 maximum to 15 percent and a $2,500 maximum.

This would bring standard deductions closer to the actual deductions of most taxpayers. It would enable most people to use the simple short form tax return and would result in lower taxes for millions of people in the $5,000 to $20,000 income range.

3. Reduce the rate on the first two income tax brackets from the current 14 percent and 15 percent to 9 percent and 13 percent.

This proposal would provide $3.4 billion in tax relief to all taxpayers, but about 95 percent of the saving would go to those with incomes below $20,000.

These are the AFL-CIO's proposals for tax justice.

They make sense.

The graduated income tax is the fairest system of taxation ever devised anywhere in the world.

It is based on ability to pay, with the tax rate rising progressively as income goes up.

That's the system the United States started out with more than half a century ago.

But the tax structure has been badly rigged as, over the years, influential business groups managed to get special privileges written into the law. Today about nine-tenths of the voluminous, complicated tax code is devoted to exemptions for special interest groups.

These special interest lobbyists today are doing everything they can to block meaningful tax reform. The transcript of congressional hearings is filled with their testimony urging that the loopholes the AFL-CIO is trying to close be continued, even expanded.

It will take a mighty outpouring of public indignation to counteract their influence.

America's workers pay their taxes through the payroll deduction system. Every time our unions negotiate a pay raise, the federal government gets its share.

That's OK with us. We know taxes are necessary.

What's not OK is that we're paying more than our fair share because some taxpayers pay less than their share.

The AFL-CIO and the union you belong to have urged Congress to make the tax changes outlined in this pamphlet. We want real tax justice.

You can help by letting Congress know that millions of trade union families feel strongly that all income should be taxed fairly and equitably.

Let your congressman and senators know that you want the 7 percent investment tax credit repealed and the other tax loopholes closed.

Tell them that you support the AFL-CIO program for tax reform and tax justice.

It takes three letters to make your voice heard loud and clear.

One should be sent to your congressman. His address is U. S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515.

Your state has two senators. Write to both of them, U. S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510.

The postage may be the best investment you ever made even if it isn't tax deductible. If you were a corporation you could deduct the postage.

STATEMENT BY THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON THE ABE FORTAS NOMINATION

September 24, 1968

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights vehemently opposes the use of a Senate filibuster to block the nomination of Mr. Justice Abe Fortas to be Chief Justice of the United States.

Since the organization of the Conference, nearly 20 years ago, we have recognized how the filibuster has been used to block civil rights and social welfare programs essential to a democratic nation, and have sought to change Rule XXII in order to enable a majority of the Senate to work its will. Use of the filibuster against Mr. Fortas would only add the most ignoble chapter of all to the history of this parliamentary device. We urge all Senators who value the reputation of the Senate to vote for cloture whenever it is clear that opponents of the nomination have concluded fruitful debate and are simply talking to keep the body from acting.

We are shocked and concerned, too, at the manner in which some Senators have constituted themselves a board of review on Supreme Court decisions and appear to hold Mr. Fortas personally responsible for rulings they dislike. This is obviously improper; an incredible attempt to undercut the independence of the Judiciary.

It would be tragic if a minority of the Senate, including some of the leading opponents of civil rights legislation, were to so abuse the power of advise and consent as to attempt to intimidate the Court. Now, more than ever, we need the Court to speak for that national conscience that believes it is possible, through law, to correct the worst injustices of American society.

We therefore urge all Senators to support a cloture move and allow the nomination of Abe Fortas to come to a vote.

But enforcement of the law is in serious danger now because Congress will not appropriate any money for that purpose. The Senate allocated $9 million to the Department of Housing and Urban Development for enforcement. That would have enabled HUD to hire about 690 investigators to work nationwide. House and Senate conferees, however, deleted the $9 million and both House and Senate, as this MEMO is written, have accepted the report of the conference.

The Leadership Conference issued the following protest:

"Deletion from the budget of the Department of Housing and Urban Development of the $9 million appropriated by the Senate for the enforcement of the Federal Fair Housing Law is a shocking act. Those bent on destroying this country will undoubtedly point to it as an example of how democracy fails its citizens. The long Congressional debate on fair housing must not become a travesty through the denial of adequate funds for the enforcement of the law.

"Congress will still be in session for another week or so. It is a matter of urgent national necessity that some way be found to restore these funds. We call on all members of the House and Senate to make every effort to do so."

We likewise call upon all Conference organizations to issue their own protests against this shocking act. Only prolonged public protest will persuade Congress to restore funds before it quits.

HEADSTART TRANSFER DEADLOCKED

The proposed transfer of Headstart from the Office of Economic Opportunity to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, is still a matter of intense behind-the-scenes discussion as this MEMO is written. The Vocational Education Act (H. R. 18366) contains a Senate amendment that would authorize the transfer. It is sure to be a matter of hot debate once the House-Senate conference on the bill gets underway.

At this moment only the Senate conferees have been named. They are Senators: Wayne Morse (D., Oregon), chief proponent of the transfer; Ralph Yarborough (D., Texas), Joseph Clark (D., Pa.), Gaylord Nelson (D., Wis.), Harrison Williams (D., N. J.), Jennings Randolph (D., W. Va.), Jacob Javits (R., N.Y.), George Murphy (R., Cal.), Peter Dominick (R., Colo.), and Winston L. Prouty (R., Vt.).

The conference may be underway by the time you get this MEMO. All Senators should be wired protesting any transfer that will deny participation in Headstart to the parents and the community and kill its innovative spirit.

Electrician Threw Switch on Judicial System

By WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS

In the early 1960s, Clarence Earl Gideon, a 60-year-old electrician with a penchant for burglary, rested quietly in a Florida prison cell.

Neither he, nor did anyone else, could know that the circumstances of his conviction would lead to the changing of the face of criminal justice in the United States.

For it was his case that led to the opening of a legal Pandora's box that would ultimately assure every American citizen the right to be represented by an attorney in a criminal case.

GIDEON had been accused of breaking into a Florida poolroom and appeared before a Florida state court for his trial. He had only a sixth grade education, and was unschooled in the law.

He asked the judge to appoint him an attorney. The judge ruled that he was not entitled to an attorney since his case was not a capital offense.

Under Florida law, the court was directed only to furnish free lawyers to persons charged with capital crimes.

Gideon, who maintained his innocence, conducted his own defense, made his opening statement to the jury, cross-examined state witnesses and declined to testify.

HE WAS no match for the skilled Florida prosecutors, and the jury found him guilty and he was sentenced to five years imprisonment.

In the Florida prison, he crudely sketched out a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to the Florida Supreme Court on the grounds that he was denied the right to counsel.

"No system worth preserving should have to fear that if an accused is permitted to consult with a lawyer he will become aware of, and exercise (his) rights." — U.S. Supreme Court, Escobedo v. Illinois.

The Florida Supreme Court denied the petition.

Since 1942, the U.S. Supreme Court had been operating under the decision of Betts v. Brady, a Maryland case. The case was almost identical to Gideon's.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Betts was not entitled to free counsel because the Sixth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees counsel, does not apply to states.

NEVERTHELESS, Gideon appealed the Florida case to the U.S. Supreme Court. His problem presented difficulties to the court, and to assure he got a fair hearing, the court appointed Abe Fortas, now a Supreme Court justice, to represent him.

Bruce Jacob, with the Florida attorney general's staff, represented the state.

Betts was riddled with exceptions, but the high court had never issued a blanket ruling that any defendant in a felony case had the right to counsel.

The case was argued, and on a windy March 18, 1963, the Supreme Court ruled that Gideon was illegally convicted because he had no counsel at his trial.

THE COURT ruled that the Sixth Amendment does apply to the states because of the due process clause of the 14th Amendment.

The Sixth Amendment states: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

This meant that in all of the states, the states must furnish free counsel to indigent defendants in felony cases.

"Any person hailed into court, who is too poor to hire a lawyer, cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for him. This seems to us to be an obvious truth. . . . Lawyers in criminal courts are necessities, not luxuries," the Supreme Court ruled.

JACOB, who later became an Emory University law professor, is now doing graduate studies at Harvard University.

In a recent interview, he said that when the Gideon v. Wainwright case was handed to him, "I was shocked that every defendant did not have the right to counsel."

Jacob said he began researching the policies of Florida courts, and only a handful of Florida judges were not appointing attorneys in felony cases.

He said he had studied the exceptions to Betts in law school at Stetson University, and was of the opinion that every defendant in a felony case should have an attorney. He realized, however, that Betts was still law.

Jacob said a representative of the Florida attorney general's office went to Florida legislative leaders and told them they would have a hard time winning the Gideon case.

THEY ASKED the legislature for reforms, but none came. "I took the position that I was representing Florida, and the court was entitled to the strongest argument on both sides."

So he defended Florida, to the best of his abilities, realizing that Gideon probably was lost to the state.

Today, Jacob says he agrees with the Supreme Court on the Gideon case. "I knew it had to come."

He added that later decisions which have extended the right to counsel "haven't gone far enough. Every man is entitled to an attorney."

The Supreme Court had made an obvious ruling in Griffin v. Illinois when it said that the state must furnish a free trial transcript to indigent defendants who wish to appeal their convictions.

THE COURT ruled, "There can be no equal justice where the kind of trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has. Destitute defendants must be afforded as adequate appellate review as defendants who have enough money to buy transcripts."

In Douglas v. California, the court was plainer: "There can be no equal justice where the kind of an appeal a man enjoys depends on the amount of money he has."

In Alabama arraignments, where the defendant appears before the judge, the defendant had to enter a plea. This, the court ruled in Hamilton v. Alabama, is a "critical stage" in the proceedings and he should have an attorney present. Hamilton was a capital case.

IN WHITE v. Maryland, the court advanced a similar view. In Gideon, White and Hamilton, it was clear that in felony cases there is a right of counsel from the time of the formal charging of a defendant through the trial.

Then, in Winston Massiah v. United States, handed down in 1964, the court went further.

In 1958, Massiah was a merchant seaman aboard the S.S. Santa Maria. In April that year, customs officials were tipped that Massiah was going to transport narcotics aboard ship from South America to New York.

When the ship docked at New York, customs officials searched the ship and in the afterpeak they found three and a half pounds of cocaine.

They arrested Massiah and a man named Colson. Both obtained attorneys, were indicted and released on bond. Colson secretly began to cooperate with government agents.

"There can be no equal justice where the kind of an appeal a man enjoys depends on the amount of money he has." U.S. Supreme Court, Douglas v. California.

HE ALLOWED an agent named Murphy to install a radio transmitter under the front seat of Colson's car. He then drove to see Massiah.

Colson and Massiah talked in the parked car on a New York street. Murphy was parked downstreet with a receiver and listened to the conversation.

At Massiah's trial, over defendant's objection, Murphy testified to the incriminating statements made by Massiah to Colson. His conviction was confirmed by the 2nd U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The U. S. Supreme Court ruled that Murphy's testimony was inadmissable. They ruled that Massiah, although he was tricked, made the statements in the absence of his attorney and this violated his Sixth Amendment rights.

ANOTHER landmark decision came in the case of Danny Escobedo vs. Illinois. On Jan. 19, 1960, Escobedo's brother-in-law was shot fatally.

At 2:30 p.m. the next day, Escobedo was arrested but he made no statement. His lawyer, Warren Wolfson, obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and Escobedo was released

On Jan. 30, Benedict DiGerlando, who was later indicted with Escobedo, told police that Escobedo had fired the fatal shots. Escobedo was arrested about 8 o'clock that night.

Officers told him DiGerlando had named him. Escobedo asked for Wolfson, who, meanwhile, had wind of the arrest and hot-footed it to police headquarters.

Police told him he could not speak with his client. Wolfson went to the Homicide Bureau and was told the same thing. He waited outside the interrogation room.

About 11 p.m., the door opened and he saw his client and waved to him. The door shut.

POLICE, in effect, admitted they told Escobedo that Wolfson didn't want to see him. Escobedo, 22, had no record of previous arrest and was unschooled in the law.

DiGerlando was brought in the interrogation room finally, and Escobedo shouted, "I didn't shoot Manuel, you did."

The district attorney, Theodore J. Cooper of Chicago, came and took more statements.

What Escobedo probably did not know was that under Illinois law, complicity in a murder plot was legally as damaging as an admission of firing the fatal shots.

The Illinois court admitted the incriminating statements made by Escobedo during the interrogations conducted before Escobedo was indicted formally. The Illinois Supreme Court upheld the murder conviction.

The U.S. Supreme Court held that since the police investigation focused on one suspect they should have allowed him counsel. They said the police denied Escobedo of his Sixth and 14th Amendment rights and the statements he made should not have been admitted. The conviction was reversed.

"NO SYSTEM worth preserving should have to fear that if an accused is permitted to consult with a lawyer, he will become aware of and exercise (his) rights," the court said.

They said confessions have "often been extorted to save law enforcement officials the trouble . . . of obtaining valid and independent evidence."

Escobedo was interpreted in many ways by many states. It was in the case of Ernesto A. Miranda, an indigent Mexican ac[illegible]pe, v. Arizona that the court spelled out its policies further.

Miranda was arrested March 13, 1963, at his home and was taken to a Phoenix police station, where he was identified by a witness.

OFFICERS took him to an interrogation room. They admitted they did not inform Miranda he had the right to have an attorney present.

The U.S. Supreme Court described Miranda as a man who "was a seriously disturbed individual with pronounced sexual fantasies."

After two hours of interrogation, officers emerged from the room with a written confession. A paragraph in the statement said Miranda was informed of his legal rights and understood any statement he made could be used against him.

The confession was used in the trial and Miranda was convicted of kidnaping and rape. He was sentenced from 20 to 30 years.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed the conviction.

IT RULED that suspects must be warned prior to questioning that they have a right to remain silent, that any statement they make may be used as evidence against them and that they have the right to the presence of an attorney, either appointed or retained.

The court said the confession was inadmissable because Miranda was not apprised of his right to counsel or was his privilege against self-incrimination effectively protected.

The court has ruled that it is the burden of police to show that proper safeguards to rights of defendants were taken to get confessions.

ATLANTA Police Chief Herbert Jenkins and DeKalb Police Chief Dick Hand agree with the Supreme Court decisions. Both say the decisions make investigations more essential to solving crime.

"The ultimate goal of the courts and the police are identical and they must always be," said Chief Jenkins.

"I have no criticism of the Supreme Court. The decisions do not handicap us because justice is essential to law and order," he said.

Both Chief Hand and Chief Jenkins said the decisions do not have any bearing in the cases of professional criminals.

WHEN THEY are arrested, they refuse to talk and demand to see their attorneys, they said.

But the uneducated, indigent defendant who knows nothing of the law is protected as much as the professional criminal, they said.

Chief Hand, who is a former U.S. assistant district attorney here, said he agrees with the Supreme Court policy. "I don't feel there has been any hindrance to law enforcement."

"I am acquainting all my officers of the decisions. Confessions cannot be a substitute for properly investigating a case. We will still get our men.

"If we do not give a suspect his rights, the case should be thrown out of court," said Chief Hand.

A Vivid, Faithful Look At Founding Fathers

The framing of the Federal Constitution by the convention which met for that purpose during the hot summer of 1787 in Philadelphia marked the birth of the American nation. The first years of independence were the most critical for the young American Republic. Foreign rule had been shaken off; effective self-government had not been established. The Articles of Confederation, the political arrangement which prevailed until the Constitution of 1787 went into effect, resembled a rope of sand. The central executive authority was weak to the point of impotence, devoid of respect at home and abroad, starved of funds, unable to enforce observance of treaties, to honor debts, to create a valid national currency.

William Ewart Gladstone, outstanding British Liberal statesman, referred to the United States Constitution as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." How this document was struck off, how its framers met, argued, disagreed and finally came up with an agreement that was ratified, not without a hard tussle, by the majority of their fellow-citizens is a fascinating story of first-rate historic importance and interest.

And this story is magnificently told in "1787: The Grand Convention," by Professor Clinton Rossiter of Cornell, who has shown himself in earlier works as steeped in the atmosphere, the political science and general ideology of the American Revolution. His narrative combines the absorbing vividness of a contemporary newspaper account (there is no such account because the proceedings of the Convention were held in strict secrecy and with remarkably few leaks) with the credentials of authentic historical scholarship. By the time the reader has finished his work there is the satisfactory feeling that nothing really germane to the subject has been left out, from the nature of the United States at the time to the last years of the makers of the Constitution.

The 1787 Convention was composed of 55 delegates, elected by the legislatures of 12 states. Rhode Island, which had earned in conservative circles the nickname Rogue Island because of its cavalier attitude toward debts and its excessive issues of paper money, cantankerously stayed away.

The delegates, and the author gives a personality sketch of every one, accompanied by contemporary portraits, were a good cross-section of the leadership that had brought the revolutionary movement to victory. Such noteworthy figures as Thomas Jefferson and John Adams were absent, in Paris and London respectively. But George Washington was the inevitable and ideal President of the assembly and the aged Benjamin Franklin lent the aura of his many-sided fame and his diplomatic services.

James Madison perhaps had as much to do with the working out of the Constitution as any single individual, although his customary clear vision of what was politically feasible forsook him on the most difficult issue that came up for discussion: The adjustment of the interests of the more and less populous states.

The keystone of the arch of effective national sovereignty was in place when the inspired compromise was reached which gave the claims of population satisfaction in the makeup of the House of Representatives, while recognizing the identity of each state, large and small, by providing equal representation in the Senate. The author notes the underlying unity of the delegates, despite sharp differences of opinion on some issues, and also the favorable effect of the Convention's limited size with this comment:

"All the delegates were patriots, Whigs, republicans and men with Lockean views of property; all but two or three were nationalists who recognized the need for a new departure. . . . The Convention, for all its innate dignity and regard for form, operated as a large committee rather than a small assembly."

Mr. Rossiter vigorously disputes efforts to represent the framing of the Constitution as a conspiracy of haves against have-nots and the Founding Fathers as actuated by unworthy selfish motives. Their objectives, in his view, were closely linked with the public good: An end to disorder, a forestalling of despotism, protection for liberty, security for property, honor for the Republic.

The delegates were men adventurous enough to have pledged "their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor" to a revolution in the name of republicanism, a form of government that seemed far more radical and experimental at that time than it does today. At the same time they were not cloistered doctrinaires, but men of practical experience; the majority, as the author shows in compiling an occupational roster, were planters and large-scale farmers, lawyers, merchants and state officials.

The Constitution, as it finally emerged, was a nice balance of reason and practical experience, with a series of compromises between large and small states, between North and South, between liberty and restraints on its abuse. Some issues that were to prove disruptive later, slavery and the right of states to withdraw from the Union, were passed over as impossibly disruptive.

But on balance the men of Philadelphia built soundly and deserved well of their country. It is interesting to recall that another body with the same name, Convention, came into existence during the stormiest period of the French Revolution. Its members indulged in prodigious feats of oratory. It was purged under the pressure of bloodthirsty mobs; many of its members perished on the guillotine and it passed into history without leaving any permanent imprint on French political institutions.

But America's Convention, meeting in the staid atmosphere of Quaker Philadelphia, conducting its discussions in privacy with no threat of mob violence or military pressure, produced a charter of government that has been amended (conditions of amendment were properly made difficult but not impossible) and sometimes bent and twisted, but that still stands as an object of cherished respect and affection in the eyes of most Americans. There is no better guide than Professor Rossiter to the creation of this historic document, to the men who worked on its framing, their personalities, backgrounds and motives and to the points of difference which were finally resolved in the compelling interest of national unity.

SOCIAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS 1965

A BRIEF EXPLANATION

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

INTRODUCTION

The Social Security Amendments of 1965, which were signed into law by President Johnson on July 30, have made many important changes in the social security program—changes which will directly or indirectly affect every American family.

This is a brief report on these amendments and how they affect you.

HEALTH INSURANCE FOR THE AGED

Beginning July 1, 1966, nearly all Americans 65 and over will become eligible for two kinds of health insurance protection: hospital insurance and additional voluntary medical insurance for those who choose to take it.

YOUR HOSPITAL INSURANCE BENEFITS

Beginning in July 1966, the hospital insurance program will pay the cost of covered services for the following hospital and posthospital care:

- Up to 60 days in a hospital (except for the first $40.00) and all but $10.00 per day for an additional 30 days for each spell of illness. (There is a lifetime limit of 190 days on payments for treatment in mental hospitals.)
- Up to 20 days in an extended care facility (the facility may be a skilled nursing home or a convalescent section of a hospital which meets the requirements of the law) and all but $5.00 per day for an additional 80 days for each spell of illness. These services will be provided only after a hospital stay of at least 3 days. (This part of the program begins on January 1, 1967.)

- Up to 100 home-health visits by nurses or other health workers in the 365 days following your release from a hospital or extended care facility. (Doctors' visits are covered only under the voluntary medical insurance plan.)
- 80 percent of the cost of outpatient diagnostic tests in a hospital (after you pay the first $20.00) for each 20-day period of diagnostic testing.

Where Does The Money Come From?

Money to pay hospital insurance benefits comes from a special contribution which starts in 1966 at just over one-third of one percent (0.35%) each for workers, their employers, and self-employed people. For example, a worker who earns $4,000 will pay $14 in 1966, and his employer will pay an equal amount. In 1967 the rate will be 0.5 percent; thus the worker with $4,000 earnings will pay $20 in 1967. The tax gradually increases, until in 1987 and afterward it is eight-tenths of one percent each for employee, employer, and self-employed persons. On the maximum earnings of $6,600 yearly, a worker will pay $23.10 in 1966; $33.00 in 1967; and $52.80 in 1987 and thereafter.

The cost of the insurance for people not entitled to social security benefits will be met from general revenues.

YOUR MEDICAL INSURANCE BENEFITS

You will not be covered by the medical insurance plan automatically. You will receive this protection only if you sign up for it. When you enroll for medical insurance, you agree to pay a premium of $3 monthly, with the Federal Government matching this amount. This cannot be changed before 1968. The rate can be adjusted later if medical and other costs covered by this insurance program rise.

Medical insurance will pay 80 percent of the reasonable charges[1] for the following services after the first $50 in each calendar year:

- Physicians' and surgeons' services.
- Home health services even if you have not been in a hospital—up to 100 visits a year.
- A number of other medical and health services, such as diagnostic tests, surgical dressings and splints, and rental of medical equipment.

ENROLLING FOR MEDICAL INSURANCE

If you reach 65 before January 1, 1966, you will have protection under medical insurance on July 1, 1966, when the program begins, only if you enroll before March 31, 1966.

If you reach 65 on or after January 1, 1966, you will have protection at the earliest possible date if you enroll during the 3-month period just before you reach 65.

Where Does The Money Come From?

Money to pay for medical insurance benefits comes entirely from the $3 per month which you pay and an equal amount which the government pays.

If you are receiving social security, railroad retirement, or civil service retirement benefits, and enroll for the medical insurance, the $3 a month will be deducted from your monthly benefits, beginning with July 1966.

The law provides that the $3 premium rate will be continued through 1967.

In each odd-numbered year beginning with 1967, the cost of the medical insurance program will be studied. If the premium rate, including the government's share, is not enough to cover the cost of the program for the next two years, the rate may be changed. The government will continue to pay half the cost.

When you enroll for medical insurance, you are not under any obligation to continue it beyond the end of the next odd-numbered year. Thus, if there is at any time an increase in the premium rate, you will at the same time have an opportunity to drop out of the program if you wish.

How To Qualify For Health Insurance Benefits If You Are 65 Or Over

Most people will not have to go to the social security office to qualify for protection under the hospital and medical insurance programs.

You will not need to go to your social security office if—

- you are getting social security or railroad retirement benefits. You qualify automatically for hospital insurance, and an application card for medical insurance benefits will be mailed to you by December 1965 with a leaflet explaining both of these programs.
- you are receiving a Federal civil service retirement annuity. You will get information and the necessary applications by mail. You will be told if it is necessary to go to the social security office later.

[1] For services provided by an organization on a prepayment basis and for certain other services, the medical insurance may pay 80% of the reasonable cost rather than 80% of the reasonable charges.

- you are receiving public assistance payments. In most cases, the public assistance agency will assist you in applying for hospital insurance and will advise you about enrolling for medical insurance.

You should go to your social security district office if you are not receiving any of the above payments and if—

- you have worked under social security but have never applied for benefits. The people in your social security office will help you apply for hospital insurance. They will also advise you on how you can enroll in the medical insurance program.
- you have never worked under social security. Get in touch with your social security district office between September 1, 1965, and March 31, 1966. If you are able to visit the office, take with you proof of your age.

These health insurance programs do not start until July 1, 1966. Don't because of this new law cancel any hospital or medical insurance you may now have.

For more information on health insurance for the aged, ask for leaflet No. 2.

SOCIAL SECURITY CASH BENEFITS ARE INCREASED

If you are receiving social security benefits, the amount will be increased by 7 percent, with back payment of the increase being made for January 1965 and following months.

You do not need to do anything to get this increase.

A special check to be mailed in the latter part of September will cover back payments due for January through August. Your first regular monthly check at the new rate will be mailed to you early in October 1965 for the month of September.

If your benefits have been temporarily stopped because you are working, you will receive any amount that is due you, including the increase, after you make the annual report of your 1965 earnings.

Those who first apply for benefits in the future will also get the 7 percent increase over benefits payable under the old law.

For those who retire or become eligible for social security disability or survivors benefits in future years, benefit amounts even higher than those resulting from the 7 percent increase will be possible. This is because the maximum amount of earnings that can count toward social security benefits each year will be increased to $6,600 in 1966. The chart on page 10 shows the new benefits payable.

BENEFITS MAY BE PAID TO STUDENTS UP TO AGE 22

If you are eligible for social security benefits as the unmarried son or daughter of a person receiving old-age or disability insurance benefits or a person who has died, you may qualify for benefits, if you are continuing as a full-time student, until you reach age 22.

If you were receiving social security payments which were stopped when you reached 18 and you are a full-time student under 22 years of age and still unmarried, your benefits may now be started again. Payments may be made for months back to January 1965.

If you are receiving social security benefits and are approaching your 18th birthday, your benefits may be continued if you are a full-time student. For further information about this, or to get your benefits started again if you are eligible, you or your parent should get in touch with your social security office.

If you were already 18 or over when one of your parents became entitled to old-age or disability insurance benefits or died but you were not yet 22 in January 1965, you may now be eligible for social security benefits beginning with January 1965 if you have not married. Your social security office will need your own and your parent's social security account number and your birth certificate.

For more information about benefits for students up to age 22, ask your social security office for leaflet No. 4.

BENEFITS FOR WIDOWS AT AGE 60

If you are the widow of an insured worker, beginning with September 1965 you may start receiving benefits as early as age 60 if you decide to accept a reduced monthly amount. The first check, for September, will be payable early in October.

The amount of the reduction is five-ninths of one percent for each month a benefit is received before age 62 ($6\frac{2}{3}$ percent reduction for each year). The closer you are to 62 when you start receiving benefits, the smaller the reduction will be. On the average, a widow who accepts benefits before age 62 will collect about the same value in total benefits over the years, but in smaller installments to take account of the longer period during which she will be paid.

For more information about benefits for widows at age 60, ask at your social security office for a copy of leaflet No. 5.

THE AMOUNT OF SOCIAL SECURITY CREDIT REQUIRED FOR PEOPLE 72 AND OVER TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS IS REDUCED

If you are 72 or over and have not been able to qualify for social security benefits because you (or your husband) did not work long enough under social security, you may now be eligible for payments up to $35 a month. Although some social security credit is still required, the amount of work required under the new law is less for certain people 72 and over than it has ever been in the past.

If you are 72 or over and are not receiving social security benefits, you should check with your social security district office if you (or your husband) ever received social security credit for work. Payments under this provision can begin for September 1965.

IF YOU WORK AFTER YOU APPLY FOR BENEFITS

After 1965 if you earn no more than $1,500 in a year, you may receive benefits for all months of the year. Under the law in effect through 1965, the payments you receive are reduced if you work and earn more than $1,200 in a year.

After 1965, if you earn more than $1,500 in a year, the general rule is that $1 in benefits will be withheld for each $2 of earnings over $1,500 and up to $2,700. In addition, $1 in benefits will be withheld for each $1 of earnings over $2,700.

There are two exceptions to this rule:

If in any month you neither earn more than $125 working for someone else nor do substantial work in a business of your own, there will be no deduction from your benefit for that month no matter how much you earn in the rest of the year.

For months after you are 72, there will be no deduction from the benefits because of work after you reached 72.

Another change in the law is important for people 65 or over who receive royalties because of copyrights or patents they obtained before they reached 65. After 1965, this income may be excluded in figuring your earnings.

If you work after applying for old-age insurance benefits, your additional earnings may increase the amount of your monthly payment.

The Social Security Administration will use its electronic computers to determine whether your recent earnings will increase your benefit amount. If so, the increase will be made automatically and you will not have to apply to have your benefit refigured.

On account of this change, you cannot lose by applying as soon as you are 65 for any benefits due you even though you continue to work.

[1] Generally, in figuring average yearly earnings after 1950, 5 years of low earnings or no earnings can be excluded. The maximum earnings creditable for social security are $3600 for 1951-1954; $4200 for 1955-1958; $4800 for 1959-1965; and $6600 starting in 1966. Because of this, the benefits shown in the last two columns on the right will not generally be payable for some years to come. When a person is entitled to more than one benefit, the amount actually payable is limited to the largest of the benefits.

BENEFITS FOR DIVORCED WOMEN

Under the new law, a divorced woman may receive benefits on her former husband's account. To do so, however, she must have been married to him at least 20 years before the divorce and he must have been contributing (or obligated by a court to contribute) to her support when he became entitled to social security benefits or died. Under the old law, a divorced woman could receive benefits on her former husband's account only if she had in her care a child receiving benefits based on his earnings.

A woman who is divorced while she is receiving benefits based on her husband's earnings may continue to receive benefits if she and her husband had been married at least 20 years. Benefits payable under this provision can begin for September 1965.

DISABILITY PROVISIONS CHANGED

Under the old law, disability benefits could be paid only to a worker whose disability was expected to continue over a long and indefinite period or to result in death. The new law provides that an insured worker whose disability is expected to last for at least 12 months may qualify for disability benefits beginning with the seventh month of his disability. The first month for which payments can be made under this change is September 1965.

Workers whose applications for disability insurance benefits have been denied because their disability was not expected to continue indefinitely, but who are severely disabled, should get in touch with their social security office.

The new law also liberalizes the requirements affecting people who are disabled by blindness. For more information about the changes in disability benefits, ask your social security office for leaflet No. 8.

SOCIAL SECURITY FOR DOCTORS AND MEDICAL AND DENTAL INTERNS

If you are a self-employed doctor of medicine, your professional earnings will count toward social security benefits for you and your family.

For taxable years ending on or after December 31, 1965, you must complete Schedule SE of your Federal individual income tax return to include your earnings in professional self-employment and pay the self-employment tax. Your net earnings will be counted toward social security benefits for you and your family for any year in which they amount to $400 or more.

Most medical and dental interns, and medical and dental residents in training, will receive social security credit for their professional salaries. If you are employed as an intern, be sure your employer has your social security account number. Leaflet No. 7 explains this provision of the new amendments in detail. Ask for it at your social security office.

CONTINUING BENEFITS FOR WIDOWS WHO REMARRY

If you could have qualified for benefits as a widow and remarried after reaching age 60, you will be eligible for whichever benefit is larger: either one-half the retirement benefit of your former husband, or a wife's benefit based on the earnings of your present husband.

Benefit increases and new benefits payable because of this change in the law will start with benefits for September 1965.

TIPS WILL COUNT

Cash tips you receive in your work for one employer, provided they amount to $20 or more in a month, will now count toward social security benefits for you and your family. Beginning in 1966, you will be required to report in writing to your employer the amount of tips you receive and to pay social security contributions on the tips. Your employer will include your tips in his social security tax reports and Form W–2 along with your wages, but he will not have to match your social security contribution on the tips. The law requires that you report to your employer the amount of your tips within 10 days after the month in which you receive them. Leaflet No. 6 explains in more detail how to report your tips for social security. Ask for it at your social security office.

NEW OPPORTUNITY FOR CLERGYMEN

Under the new law, all clergymen have at least until April 15, 1966, to elect to be covered by social security. The time allowed for the decision had expired for many ministers. Now they have another opportunity to become covered.

CHANGE IN COVERAGE FOR FARMERS

If you are a self-employed farmer and your gross earnings from farming in a year after 1965 are $2,400 or less, you may report two-thirds of your gross earnings, instead of your net earnings, for social security purposes. If your gross income from farming is more than $2,400 and your net earnings are less than $1,600, you may report $1,600 for social security purposes.

FINANCING THE NEW BENEFIT PROVISIONS

To finance the changes in the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance programs, the social security contribution rate and the earnings base on which social security contributions are paid have been changed. The earnings base goes from $4,800 to $6,600 on January 1, 1966. The new contribution rate schedule for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance is shown below.

In addition, the law establishes a separate payroll contribution to finance the program of hospital insurance for the aged. These contributions will go into a separate trust fund in the U.S. Treasury.

Example of Total Contributions: An employee earning $4,000 a year will pay a total of $168.00 in 1966 for his regular social security tax contributions and hospital insurance. In 1967, his total would be $176.00; and in 1987 and thereafter, $226.00. An employee earning $6,600, the maximum credited under the law, will pay $277.20 in 1966; in 1967 he will pay $290.40, and in 1987 and thereafter he will pay $372.90.

The voluntary medical insurance plan, financed by $3 monthly premiums from enrollees and a matching payment from general revenues of the government, will have its own trust fund in the U.S. Treas-

The New Challenges To Organizing

by William L. Kircher

As the labor movement resumes its long-term growth, it faces unprecedented challenges in its organizing efforts. In a long and often turbulent history, trade unions have been broken and have risen again despite depressions, company police, court injunctions, armed militia, political attacks and even such prosperity as the American Plan offered in the 1920s.

Today, with the labor movement solidly established, unions are finding they can progress only if they recognize the vast changes under way in American society. Rapid technological change, popularly called "automation," is remaking the workforce. The baby boom of the postwar years has come of working age. The civil rights revolution continues to ripple through every segment of American life. More women have become fulltime workers. The white-collar and technical occupations have emerged as the new growth areas. Education and training are clearly today's keys to advancement.

The new young look in the workforce has long been predicted. Experts say the average age in this nation will be 25 years by 1968. This means the "average person" will have been born in 1943. As far as the appeal of labor history is concerned, what can this young person be expected to know of the Great Depression, the sweatshops, the sitdown strikes, the union role in building the wartime "arsenal of democracy" and other early accomplishments? Most of the benefits for which union members struggled, bled and died were here when this young person arrived, so he may easily assume the benefits always existed.

To try to create in him an understanding and appreciation of days and conditions that existed before he was born as a means of exciting him towards embracing unionism just isn't going to get the job done. Before he accepts unionism, he is going to have to recognize it as a helpful method of getting at the things bothering him today.

Hardly anyone joined unions in the late thirties and early forties just because the Knights of Labor had a difficult time in the latter 19th century. It's just possible that the "good old days" of the thirties excite a desire in young workers to join unions today just about as much as the Knights of Labor excited the young fire-eaters in Flint or Gary 30 years ago.

Whether he is a technician or one of the working poor . . . a teacher or a drop-out in marginal employment . . . a Negro in the South or a Mexican-American in the West, one thing is certain—his receptivity to unionism is going to be in accord with his ability to see it as a device to help him with his problems today and to assist him in reaching the reasonable goals he has set for himself for tomorrow.

It is in facing these challenges as they exist today that the events of the past 10 years and an examination of how they contributed to the organizational dropoff become important. To face the fact that the categories of employment in which unions have traditionally grown are the areas where the least expansion is occurring, and at the same time to face the fact that the great expansion areas of the workforce are those in which unions have demonstrated the least organizational effectiveness, is to recognize the overwhelming need for some kind, perhaps many kinds, of change. Probably the greatest change is simply facing the fact that what the union stands for must be responsive to the needs of today's workers.

The growth rate of unions during the first 10 years of merger is a subject about which many writers have had a great deal to say.

There are many different sets of figures available on the union potential among the non-union segments of the national workforce. There is an even greater variety of percentage figures.

The variation in the figures is sometimes a matter of manipulation. At other times it is the result of honest differences in statistical methods. Whatever use is made of the figures, and whatever the method of arriving at them, one thing is certain—organized labor's growth rate has not reached expectations. Over the past decade, union membership levels have remained rather constant. Organizing efforts have produced substantial growth in terms of new members, but this has barely offset the loss of membership through plant shutdowns, automation-shrunk workforces, runaway plants, etc. Simply maintaining the numerical total has meant the relative size of union membership has gradually worsened over the past decade as the workforce grew.

At the time of merger, for every two workers with union cards in their pockets there were three who could have had cards but didn't. Those three without union cards are now four and the fourth one represents the increase in the workforce with which union organizing efforts have not kept pace.

Why it happened that way is something every union is studying today in an effort to discover clues for better growth performance in the future.

There are those outside the labor movement who would like everyone to believe that all this means workers no longer need unions or that they no longer are attracted to unionism. This is pure hogwash.

The annual average number of workers in units for which unions have gained bargaining rights during this 10-year period is nearly a quarter million and the rate of acceptance in the last six-month period of 1965 hit a new 10-year high.

There is a noticeable upsurge of interest on the part of such critical groups as teachers, government workers, retail sales persons and others. The current increase in favorable organizing results is not, significantly, limited to any one geographical area.

One of the best indications of the fact that workers still need and want unions is a recent article in the Wall Street Journal which details the accelerated efforts and highpowered methods of managements to resist unionization by their employes. Obviously, if workers were losing interest in organizing into unions, there would be no necessity for such an acceleration and proliferation of anti-union campaigning.

Still, it is important to look at the reasons for the deceleration in the rate of union growth over the past decade—and there are reasons, many of them. They probably fall within five basic categories: the economic climate, the legislative encumbrances, the massive management resistance campaign, internal problems of organized labor and the changing nature of work and of the working population.

The economic characteristics of the past 10 years were substantially different from those of the periods in which the great growth of unionism occurred. The worker today who has become an "owner"—either in fact or through the phenomenon of credit—is a far cry from the worker of those early days who owned precious little, if anything. The memory of the Great Depression has almost disappeared completely.

Many, if not most, paychecks are committed before they are received. The worker who is meeting house payments, television payments, car payments, education bills, etc., is "in hock" so far in advance that he is apprehensive about anything that might rock his personal economic boat. The forces who are not interested in seeing unions grow do a fairly good job of equating unionism with boat-rocking.

Much of the management community interpreted the merger of the AFL and CIO as a call to arms. Labor relations became the science of preventing union relations. A new creature came to flourish—the "labor consultant." His expertese in frustrating workers' efforts to unionize became a highly marketable commodity in the management community.

The company labor relations director who in earlier days often rose from the ranks and got the job because of his ability to understand shop problems and get along with the workers has been replaced in many cases by college-trained psychologists whose ability lies in keeping company employe relations policies from going beyond the point where the workers might become interested in organizing. "Do-it-yourself" kits on what to do when the organizer shows up are available from many sources.

The time was ripe in 1955. Taft-Hartley, passed in 1947, was being administered by a National Labor Relations Board tuned in to the big business wishes of the "Eisenhower age." In the very first year of the Board under the Eisenhower Administration, the number of employes in units which voted union in NLRB elections dropped to almost half of what it had been averaging annually. At the same time, the percentage of all the unfair labor practice cases issued against unions doubled and then later doubled again. Whereas less than one of six complaints had been against unions prior to 1954, in 1956 over half of all the complaints were issued against unions, even though the ratio of charges against unions and against employers remained relatively constant.

The McClellan hearings were daily grist for the opinion-making mills. Yet the AFL-CIO's voluntary accomplishments in the field of standards of conduct, labor's "Code of Ethical Practices," for example, received little more than passing reference.

The extra burdens placed on parent unions and their subordinate bodies by the Landrum-Griffin Act necessitated the assignment of manpower which normally would have been utilized in organizational efforts. The brush-fire wars carried on by "right-to-work" fanatics at the state level drained off money and manpower that otherwise would have been put into organizing.

Internally, there were the problems of "growing pains." Many unions were having to learn to "live together" with other unions under radically-changed circumstances. The problems of effecting a multitude of mergers at state and local levels were critical in many areas for several years. And through all these trying problems, the emphasis on autonomy, democracy and voluntarism was never lessened.

There never has been a recipe for successful organizing and there probably never will be. If such were the case, it would have been written in the great growth periods and the rate would never have slackened off.

The fact is that organizing is a personal business. As people and their conditions change, the nature of the organizing task changes. The basic tools remain pretty much the same, but they must be sharpened and reshaped constantly to meet the challenges as they develop.

Essentially, organizing is a communications process and a two-way process at that. It is as important for an organizer to know what workers' attitudes are as it is for workers to know what the union program is.

Devising methods of penetrating the network of fear and misunderstanding that has been carefully woven around workers' attitudes toward unions by the events of the past decade is what makes the skill requirement in organizing one of the greatest of any task in the movement today.

There are those who think that change means the introduction of many new techniques and methods, perhaps turning to the highly trained social scientist or psychologist, or utilizing skills similar to those of Madison Avenue. It may well be that some of these very things will be needed to help unions to better condition the climate within which they organize and to more effectively formulate and direct their organizational programs.

In the main, however, the idea of unionism is still going to have to be conveyed to the non-union member by unionists. Further, it's going to be done with essentially the same kind of machinery that has been used in the past. A look at that machinery is far from discouraging. It is there and in good shape, except for a little dust here and there.

There are 128 national and international unions in the AFL-CIO, nearly all of them having regional or district offices in various sections of the country, all with manpower and facilities which can "beef up" organizational efforts. There are in excess of 60,000 local unions of these affiliates, embracing nearly 14 million members. Many of these locals have offices, meeting halls and fulltime personnel.

There are about 800 local central bodies in the nation and a functioning state body in each of the 50 states. There are six major nationally-chartered departments of the AFL-CIO, with many subordinate bodies and councils.

There are few localities where a public committee, commission or board operates for the general community betterment without some representation from the union movement of that locality. Local union members often are among those recognized and respected as community leaders.

It should be utterly impossible to look at the broad network of union representation spread over this nation and the vast source of talent and energy that it contains and shrink from the union growth challenge as an unattainable task. This is so especially if we add to all these factors the unique effectiveness of collective bargaining itself as a means of meeting the needs of workers.

The flexibility of collective bargaining is limited only by the imagination of those who use it. A great deal of the economic fabric of this nation and the fringe benefit structure about which even the employer boasts today resulted from the ideas of union leaders—ideas considered strange when first proposed.

Workers need to see unions as the embodiment of the collective bargaining process. When they do and at the same time understand their role in directing this process toward their problems, they become very firm in their determination to organize.

Unfortunately, too many people have accepted the false characterization of unionism as an institution rather than as the form which workers with common problems and mutual interests assume in order to bring their collective effort to bear on these problems.

The greatest thrust of the management resistance campaign is the effort to psychologically separate the worker from the union, to make him think of the union as a third-party entity. It is almost as though the employer would like the worker to sit up in the grandstand while management fights the union.

When an employer—or a "consultant" who is guiding him—can create such a situation, he enhances the effectiveness of his speeches and letters about strikes, high dues, violence, loss of employment and the other classic fear-producing propaganda.

It is just this kind of management activity that has led two chairmen of the National Labor Relations Board to deplore the failure of certain segments of the business community to accept the national labor policy as established by the Congress and upheld by the courts.

Lest someone consider them prejudiced in these statements, one was a Republican, the other a Democrat; one was a conservative, the other a liberal; one was appointed by President Eisenhower, the other by President Kennedy. Yet both reached similar conclusions with respect to the manner in which many employers skirt the law in order to avoid the responsibility of bargaining with their employes.

Unionism is not an institution—it is a movement, a movement of people. It has been and always will be that despite its critics, friendly and otherwise.

The Sixth AFL-CIO convention analyzed the total organizing situation and laid down essential guidelines for the future. Stating that "nothing but total commitment and total involvement" can meet the "challenge, the opportunity and the obligation" to help the organizing efforts of American workers who are still without the benefits of union representation, the delegates resolved:

"That all affiliates adopt a continuing program of evaluating their organizing operations with the aim of developing more effective means of organizing, increasing the organizing skills of their staffs and encouraging participation in coordinated organizing programs.

"That all members of AFL-CIO unions be viewed as potential and important participants in the overall organizing mission of the American labor movement."

It is the bringing together of all these factors—an understanding of workers' attitudes as they exist today, the marshaling of the vast array of talents and manpower available and then the skill of relating collective bargaining to progress and advancement—which is today accelerating union growth. And this combination is certain to do it even more so in the years ahead.

Congressman Charles Vanik answers Readers Digest attack on HR 8282, establishing federal standards for unemployment insurance

THE ISSUE

America's system of unemployment insurance is a patchwork of state systems, underfinanced and outdated. Workers in auto industry with seasonal ups and downs are among victims of poor state UC programs. McCarthy-Mills bill will correct most present UC shortcomings.

PROSPECTS

House Ways and Means Committee held hearings last year, expects to report out bill soon for floor action. Heavy mail is coming to Washington from employers against federal UC standards. Congress must hear from working people now stressing need for modernization of UC.

From Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary

Federal standards for unemployment insurance is an issue important to every American wage-earner. Reader's Digest—which never runs letters to point out errors of facts—has flooded the nation with distortions about HR 8282. Cong. Charles Vanik of Cleveland recently set the record straight by citing point-by-point errors which Digest refuses to publish to enlighten its millions of innocent readers.

THE ARTICLE

The article characterizes the bill as "* * * a shocking grab for Federal power * * " and " * * nothing less than total revolution in our system for giving benefits to the unemployed."

This is nothing less than total revolution in our system for giving benefits to the unemployed. Historically, we have always let each State lay down its own rules for dispensing such compensation. H.R. 8282 invests this vast power in the Federal Government.

Washington would set the standards which probably would become the accepted policy in each of the 50 States. For, although the new bill does not say that the States must adopt its standards, certain tax penalties would be imposed on employers in any State that did not meet every standard in 8282. These economic teeth could effectively force all the States to go along.

THE COMMENT

There is no "grab" for Federal power, and 8282 is not a revolutionary federalization of the unemployment compensation system. The unemployment compensation system was created not by the States, but by the taxing power of the Congress when it passed the Social Security Act of 1935. Even in 1935 the Committee on Economic Security said that the requirements which State laws on unemployment compensation must fulfill could at any time be increased or altered by Congress, to achieve needed improvements in State laws.

There have always been certain standards in the Federal Statute that State laws must meet for employers in that State to receive almost 90-percent credit against the Federal tax. H.R. 8282 would now provide some additional standards that State laws must meet in the future for the full credit to be allowed.

The bill imposes no penalties—it just contains provision for tax credit. And as several independent scholars have pointed out, the Federal Government must be able to use some incentive to encourage the States to make needed adjustments within a reasonable length of time. And it should be noted that the new Federal "standards" allow, as now, great initiative and variations to be made by the States.

THE ARTICLE

If these Federal standards do become law, the benefit provisions involved would probably cost billions of dollars more than present compensation programs. And employers—who have always paid the bill—would be saddled with an estimated increase of 60 percent or more in payroll taxes.

Weekly compensation checks for many unemployed would double, or more, and in certain cases could be paid for as long as a year and a half.

In addition, H.R. 8282 would liberalize the ground rules for determining who's in or out of this benefit bonanza. It would open the floodgates for untold thousands of claims now outlawed by State statutes. It could make it easier for people to cheat in collecting benefits, and more difficult to punish the cheaters.

New Grab for Federal Power: Unemployment Benefits

If it passes, the unemployment compensation bill now before Congress will cost additional billions, cut the states' traditional rights and be a step toward the complete welfare state

FRAUD

THE COMMENT

This statement creates a false impression about both present and prospective costs. Actually, benefits under State laws in 1965 totaled about $2.2 billion. Proposed improvements would have added less than another half billion dollars. One additional advantage of unemployment insurance taxes is that they are greater than benefits in periods of high employment and, therefore, represent an anti-inflationary mechanism. In poor times benefits exceed outgo from the fund, and the effect is an antirecession stimulation. In both respects unemployment insurance helps to stabilize our economic system.

Only where a benefit is now so small that it represents less than a fourth of the worker's lost weekly wage could this possibly occur. In such a case, the change is desirable. The bill does not require any benefit greater than one-half the former wage, and only then within the limits set by the maximums. The duration of the benefit depends on the worker's previous work record and on whether he continues to be able and available for work and registered for work. If he refuses a suitable job or appropriate training, his benefits will be discontinued.

The bill would strengthen administration by providing for training of State personnel so they will be better equipped to prevent fraud, properly apply eligibility and disqualification provisions of State laws, and insure that payments go only to a qualified and eligible unemployed workers.

H.R. 8282 in no way limits a State's ability to detect, prosecute and obtain criminal convictions for fraud, nor does it affect in any such provisions in State laws. In addition, H.R. 8282 allows for a benefit disqualification for fraud up to 3 years—greater than most States now impose.

Because of a long history of increasingly restrictive and punitive State qualification laws (which, for example, in some States prevent a person from receiving benefits while attempting to go through training school in the evening!) it is the purpose of 8282 to open the doors for more legitimate and honest claims.

THE ARTICLE

Such largess could further encourage a growing class in America—the voluntarily unemployed. Why keep on working, when it would be so easy to collect pay for not working? Especially since jobless benefits—in contrast to earned income—are not subject to any income or social security taxes, cannot be attached by creditors and are not subject to union dues.

Weekly, there are still about 1 million pending claims. In a year the cost runs about $3 billion.

At present, not one State meets all the standards laid down in H.R. 8282.

In fact, many abuses would get the sanction of law if the bill is adopted. For instance: Workers who voluntarily quit their jobs for any reason, including just plain laziness, could still get benefits.

Even most employees dismissed for outright misconduct could get compensation.

Any jobless person offered a new job with both suitable wages and working conditions could turn it down—and still get compensation.

New Grab for Federal Power: Unemployment Benefits

FRAUD

Millions of workers would be able to take a year's "vacation" by quitting their jobs and collecting benefits at half their pay. After that, with just 1 more day's work, the job-shirker could be eligible for a further 26-week round of benefits at half pay.

In some States, certain older workers could actually make more money—for a time—by retiring early and adding tax-free unemployment compensation to their company pensions and social security benefits.

At present, all States put a ceiling on weekly benefit checks. Alaska's top, for example, is $45. Under the new bill that State, by 1971, would have a maximum of $110 weekly, by the Labor Department's estimate.

THE COMMENT

In no circumstance would a claimant receive compensation for more than half his own weekly wage as a result of H.R. 8282. In addition to losing half his wage, he loses fringe benefits (under new contracts in the auto industry these add up to about $1 an hour) and all the amounts regularly added to one's social security accounts. And, of course, the right to collect unemployment compensation is only earned by working and by seeking work when unemployed.

The total amount of benefits paid varies greatly and with the number of persons unemployed. Only in 1958 and 1961 have benefit costs reached $3 billion. Under such circumstances, 2¼ million persons a month file claims. On the other hand, in recent months only about 1 million persons file claims weekly. Thus, while the system is needed and used in times of high economic activity as well as in times of recession, the state of the economy influences directly the extent to which it is used and the level of benefit costs. Wage insurance is responsive to need as well as stabilizing to the economy.

Nor is there any provision or change in H.R. 8282 which has not or is not being tried in some of the States.

H.R. 8282 does not require any State to pay benefits to any individual worker unless he is available for work, seeking work and willing to work, and provides further: Workers who quit jobs without good cause could be denied benefits for 7 weeks, a longer period than many States now provide.

Employees dismissed for misconduct could be denied benefits for 7 weeks, a longer period than many States now provide.

Claimants refusing suitable jobs without good cause could be denied benefits for 7 weeks, a longer period than many State laws now provide.

Even after 7 weeks, the disqualified worker will not receive benefits unless he is available for and seeking work, is willing to accept suitable work, and is eligible in all other respects.

H.R. 8282 neither requires nor contemplates the payment of benefits to any worker on "vacation." It requires payment only to workers with substantial past employment, and contains no provision that "1 day's work" qualifies an individual for benefits.

H.R. 8282 contains no proposal relating to older workers or those receiving pensions. Whatever effect there would be on the eligibility and benefits of such workers would be attributable only to provisions in State laws.

Regardless of the maximum, the bill does not require that any worker in Alaska (or in any other State) receive more than half pay. It does not require that any individual be paid $110 maximum unless his own regular weekly pay was $220 or more.

THE ARTICLE

H.R. 8282 is equally generous in the duration of payments. A common State-prescribed minimum now is 10 or 12 weeks—with 26 the usual maximum. The new bill would set a usual minimum of 26 weeks for everybody covered by compensation.

Some claimants could qualify for 26 more weeks by working just 1 day between the 1st and 53d weekly benefit checks—which comes to 78 weeks of tax-free payments.

To be eligible for the first 26 weeks of benefits, the new bill says a claimant must have worked 20 weeks "or the equivalent." Here is where the fancy footwork comes in. Actually, as Gordon W. Winks, a Chicago lawyer representing the Illinois Chamber of Commerce, told Congress:

In 36 States a claimant being paid the statewide weekly average could satisfy the definition of equivalency by working only 5 weeks in a year, provided no more than 3 were in 1 quarter.

THE COMMENT

It certainly seems necessary to establish a minimum of 26 weeks, when 25 percent of the claimants in 1963 exhausted all their benefits before finding work.

As an example of the options left open to the States, if a worker does not accumulate enough weeks of work to qualify for 26 weeks of benefits, the States may pay him benefits on a graduated basis of their own determining.

The present provisions of State laws can be met occasionally by a person with an unusual work record of limited duration. In providing qualifying requirements in State laws, State legislatures obviously discounted the likelihood or frequency of such odd situations, and similar provisions in H.R. 8282 are merely adapted to existing State statutes.

To avoid substituting a uniform Federal formula for the individual State approaches, H.R. 8282 was drafted in terms of equivalents in order to accommodate the States' basic types of systems for determining benefit entitlement.

Under present laws in 21 States, he could now meet the qualifying requirements for benefits and in 39 States he could do so by working 5 weeks for somewhat higher than average wages.

HIGHLIGHTS OF McCARTHY-MILLS BILL

Proposed Employment Security Amendments of 1966

1. Increases Benefits

Higher weekly amounts would be required of the states. Maximums must be raised in steps until they reach two-thirds of each state's average weekly wage. Benefit floor will be half of each unemployed worker's weekly wage loss, subject to the new maximums.

Example: If the average wage in a state is $100, the statewide maximum must be set at $67. Then an $80-a-week worker must receive at least $40 (half of his wage loss), a $100 worker $50 and so on until the $134 a week worker hits the maximum of $67. All higher wage workers also are limited to $67.

2. Extends Duration

Long-term adjustment benefits would go to those who use up all their state allowances. Payments continue at the state weekly amount and for six more months, if needed, so long as the unemployed worker maintains his eligibility. Benefits also are payable during an approved training period.

Example: A jobless worker draws $35 a week for 26 weeks when his benefits expire under state law. If his past earnings record and continued availability for work make him eligible, he applies for federal adjustment benefits (through the state employment office). He is entitled to his first check on the 27th week of unemployment, also at $35, and continues drawing until he finds work or until the 52nd week. If, during this time, he participates in an approved training program, he continues to draw benefits. If he refuses approved training or suitable work he can be denied benefits for six weeks.

3. Expands Coverage

Protection would be extended to 5 million more workers, including those in small establishments, in nonprofit organizations, on large farms and in agricultural processing companies.

4. Sets Fair Penalties

Fair limits would be set on disqualification penalties. Benefit denial for voluntary quit, discharge for misconduct and refusing suitable work or training is limited to six weeks in state and federal plans. No reduction in benefit amount will be permitted when a worker leaves the state in search of work (now practiced in three states).

5. Strengthens Financing

Up-to-date financing would be achieved through a higher tax base (to be raised from $3,000 to $5,600), federal grants-in-aid to states with abnormally high benefit costs and repeal of federal experience rating requirement. The long-term adjustment benefits and grants-in-aid are to be financed both from general revenues and employer contributions which are to be raised 15/100ths of one percent.

New Grab for Federal Power: Unemployment Benefits

FRAUD

THE ARTICLE	THE COMMENT
Many part-time workers could satisfy the requirement by working only 2 days a week for 20 weeks.	This would satisfy present qualifying requirements in 12 States, 6 of which require less than 20 weeks.
A well-paid entertainer could satisfy all the requirements by working one day in one quarter of the year and one day in another.	This could meet present qualifying requirements in 40 States. For example, under the present Illinois law to be eligible a person must earn a total of $800 in his base period, with $175 in a quarter other than his high quarter. The entertainer could meet this requirement by earning $600 for 1 day's work and $200 for another day in a different quarter.
In the first place, the new bill would skyrocket the amount of payroll taxes earmarked directly for the Federal Government. This flat tax, levied on business, is now a maximum of $12 annually per worker; under 8282, this maximum would rise to $36.30, making an overall increase of $995 million per year. Payroll taxes for State compensation funds would also jump astronomically—to pay for the liberalized benefits and to cover the voluntarily unemployed pensioners and others now disqualified by State laws. Nobody really knows how much the whole works would add, but guesses range up to $2 billion—on top of the billions we are already spending on unemployment compensation.	The cost impact is grossly overstated. Actually, unemployment compensation protection is provided at bargain rates. In 1964 and 1965 the combination of State and Federal taxes averaged about 1½ cents per payroll dollar. Had H.R. 8282 been in full effect, the cost would have been about 2 cents. The Federal share of the tax would rise to $36.30 by 1971.
All States now have a system for a sliding scale of taxes on employers. In most States an experience rating is kept for each company, to record how many compensation claims are filed by its former employees. Firms with a steady employment record pay less taxes than those with a high labor turnover.	H.R. 8282 merely surrenders to the State legislatures full control of their traditional rights to regulate State taxation and removes Federal restrictions on this process. It is a "giant step" away from the domination of the States, and it is a reduction of the monolithic government in Washington.
H.R. 8282 does not go the whole way in giving the union leaders what they want in this respect. It would not abolish the experience-rating system, but it would make it possible to abolish experience rating with considerable ease. Under the provisions of the new bill, employers with a high labor turnover doubtless would join with the unions in pressuring their legislatures for uniform taxation of all employers. A system in which everyone paid at the same rate would of course reduce the high payroll taxes now paid by firms with bad experience ratings.	H.R. 8282 permits a State to keep its present experience-rating system if the State legislature wishes to do so. But the article does not trust State legislatures to evaluate experience rating on its merits, or to resist pressures of unions and some employers for another system. The writers apparently believe that it should defend at all cost, including the fullest use of Federal authority, maximum tax savings through experience rating for some employers, but that even minimum Federal protection for workers encroaches on the States' traditional rights.
A cabal of labor leaders and Washington bureaucrats is now trying, quietly but with determination, to ram through the greatest raid ever aimed at this country's unemployment-compensation system.	The comments above should clear up some of the fallacies and distortions concerning unemployment compensation and H.R. 8282. Public understanding of the issues will come from a more rational debate of the issues than is reflected in the opposite opening sentence of the Reader's Digest article.

CLOSING THE BENEFITS GAP

How State Benefits Compare With Proposed Federal Standard

* Does not include dependent allowances. Nothing in proposed federal standards bill would prevent state from continuing dependent allowances in addition to basic maximum.

This chart shows how unemployment insurance benefits would rise state by state if McCarthy-Mills bill is passed.

Notice where your own state benefits stand now, and see how much more UC you would get if federal standards would be established.

Also note the wide gap in average benefits now.

When a state pays low benefits it pulls down the whole UC structure. Low benefits like low wages are a drag on everybody, and they penalize states with higher benefits.

Keep this chart as a reference to show your Congressman or Senator why your state will be helped by passage of McCarthy-Mills bill.

"Unemployment insurance has not kept pace with the times. . . . Improvements are essential if the program is to exert a strong stabilizing effect on the economy and provide people with adequate income when out of work."

—President Johnson

√ "Coverage under unemployment insurance should be extended to all employees who receive wage income without regard to the size, nature, or place of the employing unit; payment of unemployment insurance benefits should be adequate in amount to sustain human dignity, with federally established minimum standards aimed at the payment of at least one-half of his average weekly earnings up to an established maximum related to the statewide average weekly wage."

—General Board of the National Council of Churches

√ "With all the limitations in state laws—in coverage, eligibility, duration, and weekly benefit amount—only one out of every five dollars due to unemployment is compensated. This seriously limits the value of the jobless pay system to working families and to the economy dependent on their spending. This situation would largely be corrected by enactment of H.R. 8282."

—AFL-CIO Executive Council

√ "Benefit levels must be increased; benefit periods must be lengthened; coverage must be extended; federal standards must be provided to assure that workers unemployed by factors incident to a national economy, receive adequate protection regardless of the state of residence; a permanent federal program for protection of the long-term unemployed must be added."

—National Commission on Technology, Automation, and Economic Progress

√ "This bill (H.R. 8282) remodels the federal-state unemployment insurance system established in 1935 to meet the changed needs of a changed economy. It writes the teaching of thirty years' experience into the law."

—W. Willard Wirtz, Secretary of Labor

√ "We believe that unemployment compensation must be increased, coverage must be expanded, and standards modernized and made more uniform along the lines of the McCarthy-Mills bill. This is essential to provide employment security for the American people and to meet the new problems of the technological revolution. While the majority of those whose living conditions will be improved by the new legislation, and the country as a whole, stand to benefit, Negro Americans are among those who desperately need the legislation."

—Clarence Mitchell, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People

√ "Why do we now so urgently need minimum standards provided in this bill? Because, in the absence of these standards, we have been slipping backward since 1939. The need has been becoming more urgent year by year. Lack of these standards has cost individual workers, their families, and the national economy dearly."

—Hon. Frank M. Karsten Congressman from Missouri

√ "The federal-state program of unemployment insurance was initiated 30 years ago with the passage of the Social Security Act. Since then significant changes have occurred in the composition of the labor force, in the character of unemployment, in wages and working conditions, and in the structure and technology of the economy. The unemployment insurance program, however, has not been properly adjusted to meet the present and prospective needs and problems in its field. . . . Remedial action along the lines we recommended has been long overdue."

—Thirty-eight professors from major American universities

√ "Perhaps the most significant contribution of the current proposals to make the UI system a more effective weapon in preventing poverty is the recognition that unemployment is a national problem requiring nationwide standards of remedy."

—Elizabeth Wickenden, Technical Consultant on Public Social Policy, National Social Welfare Assembly, Inc.

EDUCATION

"Too many people, for too many years, argued that education, and health and human welfare were not the government's concern. And while they spoke, our schools fell behind, our sick people went unattended, and our poor fell deeper into despair. But now, at last, in this year of our Lord, 1965, we have quit talking and started acting. The roots of change and reform are spreading, not just throughout Washington, but throughout every community in every State of this great Nation.

—President Lyndon Johnson, November 8, 1965

St. Louis Post-Dispatch

"Great, fabulous," is just one of the superlatives President Lyndon Johnson has used to praise the achievements of the 89th United States Congress.

Swept into office on the waves of his 1964 landslide, the "new" Democrats have served him, and their country, well—chalking up an unparalleled record of legislation for social progress.

On January 12, 1965, President Johnson urged Congress to "push ahead with the number one business of the American people, the education of our youth in pre-schools, elementary and secondary schools, and in the colleges and the universities"—and the 89th responded.

Forming the backbone of Congress' historic efforts to mark down education's price tag are three inter-locking programs:

- Pre-school programs like Headstart
- The Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965
- The Higher Education Act of 1965

Taken together, and backed up by two dozen other legislative triumphs, this network of federally financed programs means that any American—child or adult, rich or poor—can now afford a complete education.

It also promises to shore up the alarmingly low quality of education in most of our cities—without gouging larger chunks out of the workers' paychecks for local property, sales, and income taxes.

In 1956, city and suburban schools spent almost equal amounts to educate each of their children. During the last ten years, however, the flight of middle-income families to the suburbs has dangerously weakened the tax base most city school systems depend on for financial support. This

Federal spending for education has gone up sharply, as shown in these charts, since the passage of major assistance programs in the last few years.

—New York Times Chart

year suburban schools will spend between $150 and $300 more per student than city schools will.

And, for the most part, city schools can do little to close the ever-widening gap. More than 80 percent of their operating income must be raised at home, and their budgets are only mildly supplemented by state or federal funds. Most urban school districts reply on handouts from general city funds. Few have the legislative power to increase their tax income, or float bond issues for school construction, without the specific approval of already over-taxed voters.

Aggravated by teacher shortages, and burdened by the cultural or economic handicaps the children of the poor bring to school with them, the fiscal ills of the city school systems seemed incurable—until the 89th stepped in.

Leading off with the $1.1 billion Elementary and Secondary Education Act, Congress cut right to the heart of the financial dilemma. ESEA allocates most of its funds to improving educational opportunity for children from low income families.

But, because of a liberal formula for determining which schools may benefit, 95 percent of the Nation's counties are eligible for assistance.

The bill also authorizes a five-year school book purchasing project, stimulates experiments with new teaching methods, finances an extensive teacher-training program, and strengthens state education departments.

Backstopping this effort to graduate more and better-trained high school students is the $800 million Higher Education Act. HEA authorizes $70 million in college scholarships to 140,000 students from poor families.

In proposing the program, the President pointed out that "higher education is no longer a luxury, but a necessity." The bill also provides low-interest student loans and earmarks $494 million for a work-study program to give students part time employment.

Overseeing the pre-school preparation of the students who will reap ESEA's and HEA's fruits is the Office of Economic Opportunity. Officially charged with conducting the war on poverty, OEO has siphoned off a large share of its precious funds to ensure that poor children start off their school careers on an even footing with their more fortunate classmates.

This summer OEO's project Headstart invested $100 million in the futures of 600,000 children who otherwise would have begun school faced with almost insurmountable social and cultural handicaps.

Also included among the multitude of new programs are: basic education for adults, school construction assistance, huge vocational education and rehabilitation projects, a massive manpower training effort, and education for older Americans.

Using federal prestige and resources as a spur to local education initiative, the Democratic-led 89th Congress has done more to equalize opportunity for all Americans than, as President Johnson put it, "all the previous 176 regular sessions of Congress, put together".

"This bill is only one of the more than two dozen education measures enacted by the first session of the 89th Congress. And history will forever record that this session—the first session of the 89th Congress—did more for the wonderful cause of education in America than did all the previous 176 regular sessions of Congress did, put together. I doubt that any future Congress will ever erect a prouder monument for future generations."

—President Lyndon Johnson at the signing of the Higher Education Act, November 8, 1965

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 89th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

Vol. 112 WASHINGTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1966 No. 181—Part 2

House of Representatives

REPUBLICAN ACCOMPLISHMENTS—2D SESSION, 89TH CONGRESS

SAVING THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

Under the Johnson-Humphrey administration the once vital Small Business Administration that had been created as an independent agency in 1953 by a Republican President, was downgraded and nearly destroyed. The Office of Administrator was left vacant, the business loan program was gutted, and there were disturbing and recurrent rumors that this independent agency was to be transferred to the Commerce Department. Thanks to Republican efforts, this disastrous trend was reversed. In a series of statements and releases, the plan to eliminate the spokesman for small business in big government was exposed. As a result, the proposed transfer was killed, an Administrator was appointed, and the loan functions were reactivated. See February 23, 1966, policy committee statement.

RESCUING THE MARITIME INDUSTRY

For some unfathomable reason, the Johnson-Humphrey administration has chosen to ignore our steadily deteriorating maritime industry. Our shipbuilding program is lagging, our World War II reserve fleet is growing older and the expanding war in Vietnam is putting the U.S. merchant fleet under tremendous pressure. Even so, the administration's total maritime budget for 1967 set a 7-year low. While we have dropped to 12th place among the shipbuilding nations, Russia has risen from 12th to 7th place. Faced with this serious situation, the Republican members of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Republican policy committee set out to alert the American people to the perils of the administration's course. Although we have been unable to reverse this trend entirely, some significant gains have been made. A bill that would establish the Maritime Administration as an independent agency has been reported from committee. Also, an attempt to bury the Maritime Administration in the newly created Department of Transportation was defeated. Finally, the Appropriations Committee increased the funds for ship construction by $21.6 million.

Our national survival may depend upon the shipping that should be under construction but which the Johnson-Humphrey administration has scuttled Additional steps must be taken to correct this disastrous situation. If the present trend continues, this country that once boasted the greatest merchant fleet in the world will be left on history's shore waiting for ships that never come in. See April 20, 1966, policy committee statement.

PROTECTING THE AMERICAN PUBLIC'S RIGHT TO KNOW

In an effort to conceal and coverup, Federal agencies have adopted 24 ways to keep administrative information from public view. Bureaucratic gobbledygook used to deny access to information has included such gems as "Eyes Only," "Limited Official Use," "Confidential Treatment," and "Limitation on Availability of Equipment for Public Reference." In order to pierce this "paper curtain," Republican Members sponsored and worked hard for the adoption of Freedom of Information legislation.

Due to the opposition of the Johnson-Humphrey administration, this proposal was bottled up in committee for over a year. However, as a result of pressure from Republicans, publishers, and representatives of the press, radio, and TV, it was finally reported and enacted into law. Now this legislation can help to blaze a trail of truthfulness and accurate disclosure in what has become a jungle of falsification, unjustified secrecy, and misstatement by statistic. Hopefully, the saying "Would you believe?" can once again become a line for comedians rather than Government press officials. See May 18, 1966, policy committee statement.

URGING ELECTION AND CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTION REFORM LEGISLATION

Republican members have responded to one of the great challenges of our times—the reformation of our election and campaign contribution laws. In the past, there have been a number of excellent studies and reports on this subject. President Kennedy appointed a special Commission on Campaign Contributions, and in 1962 the report of this Commission sparked the introduction of several bills. President Johnson sent a message to Congress recommending that something be done, but the administration bill, which was finally introduced, proved to be defective and inadequate.

Alert to the importance of this legislation and the need for prompt action, the Republican leadership in the House of Representatives introduced an election reform bill that incorporated a number of the President's proposals, but also included many significant improvements and additions. For example, the Republican bill established a five-member Federal Elections Commission that would receive reports and statements regarding campaign contributions and expenditures and investigate allegations of wrongdoing. All contributions and expenditures of $100 or more would have to be reported. A $100 income tax deduction for campaign contributions is provided.

The Republican members of the House Administration Committee pressed for and obtained committee hearings and consideration of this bill. As a result, the Elections Subcommittee reported an election reform bill that contained many of the Republican suggestions. Every Republican member of the subcommittee voted for this bill and at the following meeting of the full committee, all Republican members were present and ready to vote to report the bill for immediate floor consideration. Unfortunately, the Democratic members would not join the Republicans. So, for this session, this important bill has been killed. However, in the public interest, this legislation must be enacted into law before the 1968 presidential campaign. Republicans will press for its adoption during the next Congress. See May 26, 1966, policy committee statement and reprint of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 30, 1966.

ASSISTING THE VETERANS

During the 89th Congress, action on two major veterans' bills resulted directly from Republican leadership.

The Republican-supported Veterans' Readjustment Benefits Act of 1966—Public Law 89-358—provided educational benefits for veterans of current military service. This essential legislation was enacted over the determined opposition of the Johnson-Humphrey administration. For example, in March 1965, an administration spokesman told a Senate committee that enactment of such legislation would not be in accord with the program of the President. Again in September 1965, administration spokesmen reiterated to a House committee their opposition to pending veterans' education bills.

Recognizing the need for this legislation, the House Republican policy committee in June 1965 urged Congress to provide educational benefits for Vietnam veterans "as quickly as possible." Again in January 1966, the policy committee called for "the immediate enactment of a bill that will authorize a program of eduction and training for veterans of military service," and urged the administration to support this legislation. Such a bill became law on March 3, 1966. The President, in approving the bill, said that he would sign it notwithstanding the fact that it went further than he was willing to ask for this year.

The Republican-supported Veterans' Pension Act of 1966—H.R. 17488—provides an average 5.6-percent increase in monthly pension payments to 1.8 million veterans. As early as October 1965, Republican Members of the House were calling for hearings on proposals to liberalize the pension program. When hearings were held in July 1966, an administration spokesman testified in opposition to all of the 188 pension bills pending in the House. After rejecting Republican-sponsored amendments to liberalize the bill by increasing the income limitations that control the monthly rate of pension, the Veterans' Affairs Committee reported H.R. 17488.

On September 14, 1966, the House Republican-policy committee endorsed H.R. 17488, and criticized the Johnson-Humphrey administration for the continued opposition to legislation that would provide a much needed cost-of-living rate increase for veterans. At the same time, they called for an increase in the income limitations of the existing pension laws. See January 26 and September 14, 1966, policy committee statements.

REORGANIZING CONGRESS

On July 28, 1966, the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress filed its final report with Congress. This report contained a number of important recommendations that would materially strengthen and modernize Congress. Concerned by the apparent decline of congressional initiative and independence under the Johnson administration, the Republican policy committee joined the Republican members of the joint committee in urging the immediate consideration of the committee recommendations. A bill, entitled "The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1966, H.R. 17873," that would implement these recommendations was introduced by the ranking Republican member of the joint committee. Republicans believe that if Congress is to be a more effective institution for carrying out its basic modern functions—legislative review, and representative—it must be updated. Authority that has been unwisely delegated to the executive must be regained. The continued dilution of its historic role must be stopped. However, this cannot take place until the organizational effectiveness and internal operation of Congress has been improved. The recommendations of the joint committee provide a giant step in the right direction.

The Republican members of the House of Representatives long have been interested in congressional reform. At the outset of this session of Congress, a task force of the House Republicans on congressional reform and minority staffing was appointed to study the matter of congressional reform in depth. As a result of the work of this task force, a book, entitled "We Propose: A Modern Congress," has been published. The conclusions and recommendations contained in this book were presented in full to the joint committee and many of the recommendations of the committee stemmed from the work of the task force. See October 10, 1966, policy committee statement.

HELPING COLLEGE STUDENTS

One of the most successful programs designed to help students complete their college education is the student loan program of the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Under this Republican-sponsored legislation, more than 968,000 students have borrowed $834 million.

This year, the very existence of this vital program was threatened by the Johnson-Humphrey administration's recommendation that the program of direct loans to students by participating colleges be scaled back and finally terminated in favor of insured loans. Sensing that this course of action would be disastrous for the many students who depend upon the loans, the Republican Members of Congress insisted that the student loan program be fully funded. Over the continued opposition of the administration, this was done. As a result, nearly half-a-million students at 1,600 colleges and universities will be able to obtain loans and $179 million in Federal funds will be allocated to the participating institutions for this purpose.

The wisdom of the Republican efforts on behalf of the student loan program has been underlined by recent events. One of the first casualties of the Johnson inflation and soaring interest rates was bank-made student loans. In many areas, banks have stopped accepting applications for Government-backed student loans. The 6-percent-interest rate on a student loan is no longer attractive when banks can charge their best credit risks 6 percent for short-term loans. If the administration's attempt to sabotage the student loan program had not been blocked, many students today would be out of money, out of luck, and out of school.

INCREASING SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Republican Members of Congress have demanded that social security benefits should be increased now, not in January 1968 as belatedly proposed by President Johnson. This would have been the case if the Democratic majority in Congress had acted upon a Republican proposal that would have provided an automatic increase in benefits whenever there is a stated increase in the Consumer Price Index.

Great Society spending, and the accompanying budget deficits, and certain labor settlements have spiraled living costs to a point where elderly citizens are hard pressed to make ends meet. There are nearly 40 million retired Americans who do not enjoy the benefit of rising wages and income to cope with rising prices. They are painfully aware that the purchasing power of our currency has eroded so that the 1957–59 dollar is today worth 88 cents and the 1940 dollar is worth only 43 cents.

The Republican proposal would have provided an across-the-board, 8-percent-average increase in benefits effective January 1, 1967, for approximately 22 million elderly persons eligible for social security payments. It would have been financed from the social security fund reserves without raising the social security tax rate or the annual earnings base on which it is levied. The entire House Republican membership urged Congress to stay in session until a benefits increase could be worked out. Unfortunately, our pleas on behalf of the people hurt the most by inflation, were not heeded by the Democratic majority.

STRENGTHENING PUBLIC LAW 480 AND THE FOOD-FOR-PEACE PROGRAM

In 1954, Public Law 480 was enacted into law under the leadership of President Eisenhower and by a Republican Congress. This is the cornerstone of food for peace. It has meant the difference between life and death for millions of people in a world where much of the population is engaged in a race between food production and population growth. This year the Republican Members of the House of Representatives not only supported the extension of Public Law 480 but were instrumental in adding a number of amendments that improved the legislation as follows:

First. Congressional review of the operation and administration of the program was insured by limiting the extension to 2 years.

Second. The basic concept of friendly countries was retained.

Third. The effectiveness of the Public Law 480 Joint Congressional-Executive Advisory Committee was improved.

Fourth. A 5-percent cash payment in title I sales agreements will be insisted upon when possible.

Fifth. Food sold for foreign currencies will be identified as being provided through the generosity of the American people.

Sixth. Technical assistance in friendly developing countries was expanded through a farmer-to-farmer program.

Over the determined opposition of the Johnson-Humphrey administration, Republicans also were successful in obtaining a ban on subsidized sales to nations that trade with North Vietnam. Republicans believe that when Americans and their allies are fighting and dying in the defense of freedom, nations that trade with those with whom we are joined in combat should not receive special treatment and assistance. See June 8 and September 27, 1966, policy committee statements.

UPDATING AND IMPROVING THE UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION LAWS

Under the leadership of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, a bill was reported and passed by the House of Representatives that preserved the highly successful system of autonomous State programs of unemployment insurance. In contrast to the Federal dictation and controls contained in the rejected administration bill, the Republican-sponsored measure updated and improved the present law as follows:

First. Thirteen weeks of extended unemployment compensation is provided during periods of recession.

Second. Coverage is extended to those workers who can be generally considered regularly employed and for whom there can be reasonable standards of availability for work.

Third. Nonprofit organizations are given the option of participating as "self-insurers."

Fourth. The wage base is increased from $3,000 to $3,900 beginning in 1969 and to $4,200 beginning in 1972.

Fifth. A judicial review of determinations by the Secretary of Labor with respect to qualifications of State plans is provided.

The House rejection of the Johnson-Humphrey administration bill and the acceptance of the Republican measure would have meant that the present program of unemployment compensation, while continuing to provide necessary and essential assistance to the involuntarily unemployed, would not become a federalized system that permits abuse and encourages the unemployed to remain idle the maximum period of time rather than accept suitable employment or enter training programs as quickly as possible. See June 21, 1966, policy committee statement.

IMPLEMENTING WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACTIVITIES

Although the Federal Government has played a leading role in the improvement of our rivers and harbors, it was not until 1956 under the Eisenhower administration that the first comprehensive Federal Water Pollution Control Act was enacted. This act was a good beginning and laid a firm foundation for future action. However, to be completely successful, there had to be greater State financial participation in the construction of sewage treatment works. Thus, since 1959, the Republican members of the Committee on Public Works have insisted that any increase in funds authorized for Federal grants must be used to accelerate needed construction by offering an inducement to the States to participate in the cost of treatment plants. The Water Pollution Control Act of 1966 that was supported by the Republican members and enacted into law accepts this principle. It contains substantial inducements to the States to participate in the cost of projects under both the accelerated existing program and the proposed clean rivers program.

Through the adoption of a Republican amendment, this law also provides the foundation for future industrial pollution abatement. Under this measure, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to conduct an appropriate study of methods for providing incentives to assist in the construction of facilities and works by industry. Tax incentives, as well as other methods of financial assistance, are provided. Seventy percent Federal grants for research and demonstration projects for prevention of pollution of waters by industry are made available also.

Water pollution poses a serious problem that must be solved. The legislation sponsored and supported by the Republican members of the House of Representatives will do a great deal to assist in finding a solution. Moreover, the States, cities and the communities will be encouraged to do their share in combatting the common problem of water pollution. See September 14, 1966, policy committee statement.

COMBATING FEDERAL CONTROLS

When the Defense Production Act was brought to the House floor for extension, the Democratic members of the Banking and Currency Committee included in the legislation a provision that would give the President standby authority to impose consumer credit controls. Although faced with a serious inflationary situation, the 89th Congress under its Democrat leadership was either unwilling or unable to control the real cause of the inflationary problem—the Great Society spending. Instead, they sought to impose governmental controls as a means of stemming the inflationary tide.

The Republican membership in the House of Representatives rejected and opposed this radical and unnecessary proposal. They recognized that in a period of rising inflation, it is the individual with a limited or fixed income that suffers the greatest hardship. Without question, the real casualty of such controls would be the family with substantial needs but moderate means. These individuals do not have the resources to pay cash or make a large downpayment when they purchase an automobile, a refrigerator, or some other household appliance.

Fortunately, a sufficient number of Democrat members joined the Republicans and the standby authority to impose consumer credit controls was striken from the legislation. In this instance, the control philosophy was voted down. Thus, extreme and unwarranted powers were kept from the hands of the very individuals whose spending policies have caused the inflationary problem. See June 14, 1966, policy committee statement.

FIGHTING WASTE, BUNGLING, AND SCANDAL IN THE POVERTY PROGRAM

During the past year, efforts by the Republican members of the Education and Labor Committee to gather information which would be helpful in drafting effective antipoverty legislation were hampered and handicapped at every turn. The Democrat majority on the committee repeatedly promised a full-fledged study and was given $200,000 for this purpose. However, field hearings did not materialize and an ever-changing investigative staff was confused by changes in direction, canceled trips, and recalls from investigations. The reports which were issued were sketchy and contained statistics and percentages rather than material needed to draft corrective legislation. Moreover, some reports were intentionally withheld from the Republican members.

The hearings that were finally held on the antipoverty legislation developed into an 8-day parade of administration spokesmen and apologists for the poverty program. The Republican members of the Education and Labor Committee recommended 62 witnesses who were knowledgeable in all aspects of the antipoverty program. However, these recommendations were ignored and the hearings were abruptly terminated. When Chairman POWELL, of the Education and Labor Committee, was asked why this had been done, his only reply was "Because I am the chairman."

In spite of this arbitrary and woefully inadequate action, there was no real attempt made by the Democrat leadership to correct the many abuses and gross mistakes that plagued the present program and $1.75 billion for fiscal year 1967 was ultimately authorized.

Fortunately for the American public, the Republican members of the Education and Labor Committee conducted an independent investigation of the poverty program. Abuse after abuse was documented and exposed. A solid basis for an overall reform of the antipoverty program was established. In order to effectuate the essential reforms and changes, the Republicans introduced substitute legislation, entitled "The Republican Opportunity Crusade." Unfortunately, this bill, and the reforms that it would impose, was rejected. However, a good start on an eventual cleanup of this scandal-ridden program has been made. Republicans will continue to press for needed controls and reforms in the next Congress. See July 19, 1966, policy committee statement.

IMPROVING PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION

In supporting the establishment of a new Department of Transportation, the Republican Members of the House of Representatives continued the historic policy of the Republican Party of encouraging the development of American transportation. The need for better coordination among the various governmental agencies that deal with transportation has been apparent for many years. In his final budget message to Congress, President Eisenhower stated:

> A Department of Transportation should be established so as to bring together at Cabinet level the presently fragmented federal functions regarding transportation activities.

The Republican Members were concerned that in the administration's rush to create a Department of Transportation certain safeguards and considerations might be overlooked. They found that the bill that was originally proposed by the Johnson-Humphrey administration would have granted the Secretary of Transportation broad authority that invaded the policymaking authority of Congress. It would have scrambled the now independent accident investigation functions of the CAB with the regulation and control of the airways. Also, the Maritime Administration would be buried deep within the bureaucracy of the new Department.

Due to Republican efforts, the legislation creating the new Department has corrected these defects in the original administration bill. As a result, the Department of Transportation, as it has now been established, will be able to perform efficiently and effectively. See August 10, 1966, policy committee statement.

ATTACKING TIGHT MONEY PROBLEMS

Although the big company with a large net profit may have little trouble borrowing money, the individual who wants to buy a car, obtain a college loan, or purchase a home has a terrific problem due to the present inflationary situation. If he is lucky enough to find a lender, he may have to pay an extremely high rate of interest to obtain a loan. Long before the Johnson-Humphrey administration was willing to even admit that a problem existed, the Republican Members of the House of Representatives recognized that the average person was being hurt in the present tight money market and set out on a course of action that would afford this individual meaningful relief.

They called for an immediate slash in nondefense, nonessential domestic spending—not just in regard to appropriations as the President urged, but also with respect to new Great Society program authorizations that trigger the appropriations process. The sought a reduction in point discounts on FHA and VA home financing through an administrative adjustment of rates to a more realistic level. Republicans opposed the enactment of the Sales Participation Act scheme, noting that a program of this type could only mean additional Government competition for the already scarce investment dollar.

The administration subsequently recognized its error in enacting this proposal and suspended the sale of participations. Republican Members also called for the removal of FNMA's $15,000 administrative limitation on purchases of mortgages under its secondary market operations. This, too, has been implemented by the administration. Finally, in order to cool off competition for savings among the financial institutions, Republicans pressed for and obtained sound remedial legislation.

It is unfortunate the Johnson-Humphrey administration has been slow to awaken to the dangers of this situation. Interest rates are now at the highest point that they have been in over 40 years. These high interest rates have added tremendously to the cost of financing the ever-mounting Federal debts. The rising demand for credit by the Federal Government and business has drawn credit away from credit-sensitive industries such as homebuilding. As a result, homebuilding and home buying, one of the Nation's largest industries, is now faced with a major crisis. Private housing starts in September were down 26 percent from September 1965. Applications for FHA-insured mortgages on existing homes were down 34 percent from a year ago.

In the next Congress, Republicans will continue to press for appropriate remedial action. They will do all they can to help the pensioner, the social security recipient, and the individual with a fixed income or a fixed wage who has become the forgotten man of the Great Society. See May 10, June 8, and July 27, 1966, policy committee statements.

MAINTAINING LAW AND ORDER

Republicans of the 89th Congress have stood vigilant in protecting the public's interest in, and demand for, measures assuring increased protection for law and order in our society.

Of primary significance was the National Criminal Law Revision Commission bill introduced by Representative POFF, Republican of Virginia, and 20 of his Republican colleagues in June of this year. This bill was drafted and introduced when the President's so-called crime package of legislation was found to be wanting. The Poff bill was substituted for an unimaginative proposal in the President's package, received bipartisan acclaim and support, and was passed by the House by a unanimous vote on September 6, 1966.

Republicans again answered the growing demand for increased responsibility in the streets and urban centers of our land when Representative CRAMER, Republican, of Florida, proposed and won approval for an antiriot measure. This measure prohibited the interstate travel of professional demonstrators and troublemakers. It ultimately prevailed over a watered-down administration substitute but failed in the Senate. Subsequently, approximately 80 Members of the House, Republican and Democrat, introduced this antiriot measure as separate legislation. Unfortunately, this legislation was bottled up in the Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee and failed of passage before the end of the session.

In another and vital area of criminal law reform, the Narcotics Addict Rehabilitation Act of 1966, House Republicans again remained vigilant to the cause of law and order. Republican-backed amendments were successful in turning back an administration attempt to weaken the penalty structure of present law as it applies to sellers of narcotic drugs. Mandatory minimum sentences, which nearly all witnesses at the hearings had agreed upon as an effective deterrent to narcotics traffic, were thereby maintained to assist law-enforcement officers in the war on narcotic traffickers.

REPORT OF REPUBLICAN POLICY COMMITTEE

REPUBLICAN POLICY COMMITTEE POSITIONS AND FLOOR VOTES, 2D SESSION, 89TH CONGRESS

1. January 26, 1966. Urged the immediate consideration and enactment of legislation that would establish a Commission on Reorganization of the Executive Branch (Hoover Commission).

2. January 26, 1966. Urged the immediate enactment of legislation that would authorize a program of education and training for veterans of the Vietnam conflict.

H.R. 12410 final passage: Yea 125, nay 0, not voting 14, percentage 100.

3. February 18, 1966. In connection with the Tax Adjustment Act of 1966, H.R. 12752, recommended a reexamination of the current budget and a reduction of government expenditures.

4. February 23, 1966. Adopted a statement opposing the transfer of the Small Business Administration to the Commerce Department and urged the Administration to continue the Small Business Administration as an independent agency and spokesman for the small businessman of the country.

5. March 2, 1966. Adopted a statement pointing out that the deep division within the Democratic Party over American policy in Vietnam is prolonging the war, undermining the morale of our fighting men, and encouraging the Communist aggressor.

6. March 9, 1966. Opposed Reorganization Plan No. 1 which would transfer the Community Relations Service from the Department of Commerce to the Department of Justice.

Resolution of Disapproval: yea 109, nay 18, not voting 13, percentage 85.9.

7. March 15, 1966. Opposed the authorization of an official residence for the Vice President of the United States, S. 2394.

Final Passage: yea 6, nay 125, not voting 9, percentage 95.4.

8. March 22, 1966. Adopted a statement with respect to the Second Supplemental Appropriations bill for fiscal 1966 which opposed the appropriation for the Federal Teacher Corps and the Rent Supplement program.

Motion to Recommit: yea 125, nay 6, not voting 8, percentage 95.4.

9. April 20, 1966. Adopted a statement pointing out that America is facing a crisis of major proprotions due to the deterioration of the Merchant Marine fleet and urged the Administration to take immediate action to correct this disastrous situation.

10. April 26, 1966. Adopted a statement on the Equal Employment Opportunity Act of 1965, H.R. 10065, which noted that this bill would transform the Commission into an agency that would rival the old National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act and that it would diminish the role of the States in unfair employment practice cases.

No record vote on motion to recommit.

11. May 10, 1966. Opposed the Participation Sales Act of 1966, H.R. 14544. Under this bill, the Administration could sell participations in a pool of government-held financial assets or loans which could total $33.1 billion. The money acquired through these "sales" would be paid directly to the pooling agency and used to offset expenditures that normally appear in the budget.

Final Passage: Yea 0, nay 126, not voting 13, percentage 100.

12. May 18, 1966. Adopted a statement supporting the Freedom of Information legislation, S. 1160. This bill clarifies and protects the right of the public to information that the various agencies and departments now refuse to disclose.

Final Passage: Yea 100, nay 0, not voting 40, percentage 100.

13. May 26, 1966. Adopted a statement urging the enactment of appropriate election reform legislation.

14. June 8, 1966. Opposed H.R. 15202, a bill that would increase the temporary limit on the public debt to $330 billion.

Final Passage: Yea 1, nay 121, not voting 17, percentage 99.1.

15. June 8, 1966. Supported the Food for Freedom Act of 1966, H.R. 14929, which extended and amended P.L. 480, but urged the rejection of the Committee amendment that would permit long-term dollar-credit sales.

Committee Amendment: Yea 2, nay 121, not voting 16, percentage 98.3.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 118, nay 6, not voting 15, percentage 95.1.

16. June 14, 1966. Supported the Extension of the Defense Production Act of 1950, H.R. 14025, but opposed the Committee amendment that would give the President standby authority to impose consumer credit controls.

Committee Amendment: Yea 2, nay 113, not voting 24, percentage 98.2.

17. June 21, 1966. Supported the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act contained in H.R. 15119. This bill rejected the Federal standards contained in the Administration bill, H.R. 8282, and preserved the present system of autonomous State programs of unemployment insurance.

Final Passage: Yet 121, nay 3, not voting 15, percentage 97.5.

18. July 19, 1966. Opposed the Economic Opportunity Act Amendments of 1966, H.R. 15111. This bill authorizes the expenditure of $1.7 billion for fiscal year 1966 without attempting to correct the many abuses and mistakes that plague the present so-called War on Poverty. Urged the adoption of a Republican substitute bill that would correct the most serious abuses.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 115, nay 5, not voting 19, percentage 95.9.

19. July 27, 1966. Adopted a statement on the home building industry which called attention to the fact that home building and home buying, one of the Nation's largest industries, is facing a major crisis. In order to correct this serious situation, the Administration was urged to undertake immediately a six-point program. Opposed H.R. 14026, a bill that would place a ceiling of 4½ percent on the interest that commercial banks are allowed to pay on time deposits. No record vote on the adoption of a substitute bill.

20. August 1, 1966. Opposed title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1966, H.R. 14765, as proposed by the Administration and as amended and reported by the Committee.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 86, nay 50, not voting 3, percentage 63.2.

21. August 10, 1966. Supported the establishment of a Department of Transportation as proposed in H.R. 15963, but urged the adoption of amendments which would retain the independence of the accident investigation function of the Civil Aeronautics Board, delete section 7 of the bill which would permit the Secretary to adopt national transportation investment standards and criteria without seeking Congressional approval, include the urban mass transportation program within the newly-established Department, and establish the Maritime Administration as an independent agency.

Delete Maritime Admin.: Yea 111, nay 11, not voting 17, percentage 90.9.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 117, nay 5, not voting 17, percentage 95.9.

22. August 16, 1966. Opposed the Rural Community Development Act of 1966, S. 2934.

23. August 23, 1966. Adopted a statement regarding the Elementary and Secondary Education Amendments of 1966, H.R. 13161, which pointed out that obvious defects in the present Act had been ignored totally and urged the adoption of certain corrective Republican amendments.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 93, nay 13, not voting 33, percentage 87.7.

24. September 14, 1966. Supported the 1966 Amendments to the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, H.R. 16076.

Final Passage: Yea 101, nay 9, not voting 38, percentage 100.

25. September 14, 1966. Supported the Veterans Pension Act of 1966, H.R. 17488.

Final Passage: Yea 101, nay 2, not voting 36, percentage 98.

26. September 27, 1966. Adopted a statement on the Food for Peace Act of 1966 urging the rejection of the conference provision and the adoption of the strong and effective restriction on trade with the enemy contained in the House bill.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 118, nay 1, not voting 20, percentage 99.1.

27. September 28, 1966. Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966, S. 3708. Recommended that the authorizations requested for the various programs, with the exception of the $24 million for planning funds, should be deferred until such time as the state of the economy will permit the consideration of the enormous increases visualized by this bill and realistic guidelines and standards can be prepared.

Motion to Recommit: Yea 85, nay 11, not voting 43, percentage 88.5.

28. October 6, 1966. Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Compact. Adopted a statement in support of the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Compact, H.J. Res. 110.

No record vote.

29. October 10, 1966. Issued a statement urging the immediate consideration of the Legislative Reorganization recommendations contained in the final report of the Joint Committee on the Reorganization of Congress.

Total Average: 94.4.

New Jersey's Republican Senator argues forcefully for action to end the filibuster

By Senator Clifford P. Case

The opening of the 90th Congress will set off a renewed battle in the Senate over Rule 22—the notorious filibuster rule.

As in previous years, I expect to be in the middle of it. For along with Senator Douglas, Senator Humphrey before he became Vice President, and Senator Javits, I have been one of the bipartisan group which has led the effort to break the stranglehold of filibuster.

What is Rule 22 and why is it important?

Rule 22 is the rule that allows a handful of Senators to talk a bill to death even though the majority of the Senators want to vote on it. They can do so because the rule specifies that only two-thirds of the Senators present and voting can put an end to a determined talkathon.

At times, and especially near the end of a session, the mere threat of filibuster has stopped a bill cold. The last two years provided several examples of the power of filibuster. The most dramatic was the inability of the Senate to reach a vote on repeal of 14(b). Despite the professed support of the Administration, we were unable to secure the necessary two-thirds vote to enable the Senate to vote on the measure.

Even a weak filibuster can kill a bill unless the leadership is determined to get to a vote.

Just a few weeks ago, for example, the Senate leadership, after only a few days of talk on the civil rights measure passed by the House, scheduled a vote on cloture. The leadership moved far too hastily, those of us who were for a civil rights bill thought, and the result could have been predicted—again the necessary two-thirds were lacking and the bill was dead for this Congress.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

Only a few days before the Congress adjourned, the bill to provide Home Rule for the District of Columbia was disposed of even more summarily. After only a few hours of discussion, the leadership moved for cloture knowing it could not possibly succeed. And it did not.

To an observer it seems strange that the Senate continues to permit itself to be strangled by a rule which so often frustrates the will of the majority of its members. The explanation lies in the parliamentary quagmire in which the Senate as a whole has been pushed over the years and from which it has been unable to free itself in the absence of leadership and Administration support.

It is ironic that such measures, which President Johnson himself has recommended, have been defeated in large part because of the part played by Lyndon Johnson, first as Majority Leader and then as Vice President, in the biennial struggle over Rule 22.

The history of Rule 22 is studded with examples of frustration of the majority. The ever present threat of Southern filibuster was sufficient to bar consideration of any civil rights legislation for decades. Moreover, the subtle and pernicious effects of allowing a handful of men to exercise veto power over the action of the whole Senate has been seen time and again with regard to legislation involving housing, education, labor, and social welfare.

Many a time the leadership has argued for striking a provision from a bill simply because its retention would bring a filibuster that would kill the entire measure. The availability of a filibuster has provided a lever by which a minority has been able to defeat, delay or compromise progressive legislation without ever submitting the issue to a vote of the whole Senate.

Even the matter of Congressional reform has been influenced by the threat of filibuster.

For example, in the Congress just concluded, the price for getting a Committee on Congressional Organization was to exclude any question of changes in the rules from the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction. That truly effective reform and modernization of Congress is hardly possible without some revision of the rules made no difference.

Before the leadership would bring the resolution establishing a Committee on Congressional Organization to the floor, it sought an agreement that possible changes in rules would be no part of the Committee's responsibility.

No reasonable person believes in "choking off debate" or "trampling on the rights of the minority." But that is not what those of us who have been pressing for a change in Rule 22 have proposed.

Rather we have urged a rule that will permit fair application of majority rule as set out in the Constitution. Specifically we have urged that a majority of the total Senate, that is 51 Senators, should be sufficient to limit debate after a reasonable time, say, 15 days of discussion. Thereafter, each Senator would be entitled to one hour to speak so that a total of 100 additional hours of debate would be possible.

At the opening of the last Congress, more than 50 Senators signed a statement indicating their support of a change in Rule 22. Despite the fact that a majority favored action on a change, the issue never came to a vote. The reason that it did not is necessarily complicated because it involves a series of parliamentary technicalities.

Parliamentary complexities aside, however, the essence of the problem of doing something about Rule 22 boils down to this:

It is uncontested that under the Constitution each House may determine its own rules. This means, according to proponents of majority rule, that at least at the beginning of each new Congress, a majority of the Senate can adopt rules as it proposes.

Not so, says a minority of Senators, any change in the rules can be made only if it is made according to the rules of the previous Senate. Thus, they say, any attempt to change the rule to do away with filibuster is subject to the rule permitting filibusters.

How to resolve this issue is the crux of the matter.

In 1957, the then Vice President, as Presiding Officer of the Senate, rendered an advisory opinion that, under the Constitution, a rules change could be adopted by majority vote at the beginning of the session, any rule of the previous Senate notwithstanding. This was only an advisory opinion, however, and the then Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson referred the question to the Rules Committee, from which it never emerged.

In 1963, Senator Anderson of New Mexico, long a proponent of rules change, offered a motion which, in effect, called upon the then Vice President Lyndon Johnson to rule that the Senate could change its rules by majority vote at the beginning of each new session.

But Vice President Johnson refused to make any rule whatever, even an advisory one, and simply submitted the whole question to the Senate. This amounted to giving a green light to endless debate over the question, for the only way the Senate could decide the question was a ruling by the Chair, which could then be voted upon without debate.

Without a ruling, there was literally no way for the Senate to exercise its right to determine its rule-making power. Thus, while the leadership talked of the will of the Senate as decisive, it refused to make it possible for the Senate to express its will.

The 1965 result was no better. This time the resolution for change was submitted by the leadership to the Rules Committee with instructions to report back in March. The Committee duly did so and its recommendations were placed on the calendar. They were still there when the Senate adjourned a few weeks ago.

January 1967, when the new Congress convenes is only a few weeks away. We are readying now for another effort to change the rule.

What success we will have depends on what, if any, ruling the Vice President may make when the Constitutional question is again raised.

Whether the Administration will encourage a ruling which will permit a clear-cut vote on the rules change, I do not know. I hope so, because the time has long since come to unshackle the Senate from an archaic rule which has been used to the detriment of millions and millions of Americans.

First as a Representative, then as a Senator, Clifford Case of New Jersey has compiled a solid record of legislative achievement and a reputation as a consistent and outspoken liberal.

NEW DIRECT

How will the civil rights movement remember 1966?

Most likely in two ways: as the year in which the steady legislative advances of the past decade were interrupted and even suffered setback; and as the year in which it became more evident than ever before that the drive for full equality and the War on Poverty must be carried on together.

In the long run, the second [illegible] to prove more significant. Yet at the moment the more vivid impression is made by the loss of sympathy for the civil rights movement in the white majority, the electi[illegible] victories of segregationists and the reflection of th[illegible] mood in the second session of the 89th Congress [illegible]here the Civil Rights Act of 1966 was defeated and [illegible] strenuous and not unsuccessful attempt was m[illegible] to cut back on advances already sanctioned.

Despite these disheartening developments, the year saw the production of two important documents: the "Freedom Budget" produced by the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Report of the White House Conference of this past June, when about 3,000 Americans gathered in Washington to consider how best "To Fulfill These Rights."

Labor Looks at Capitalism

by George Meany

I do not know how to define an economic system that is constantly changing and that differs greatly from one time and place to another. Our American system has changed substantially in the past half-century. Moreover, despite some similarities, our American economic system differs from that of other nations generally regarded as "capitalistic" in character.

Some may attempt to define our system in terms of private investment in corporate enterprise, where goods are produced for sale at profit.

But, as I see it, the distinguishing feature of the American system is its emphasis on people, on freedom, on free institutions and on the opportunity for betterment. The Bill of Rights, the Constitution and our educational system are all integral parts of our economic order and more essential to it than the stock exchange or any corporate board.

The founders of the American labor movement saw the great potential for improvement within the system, through the exercise of the right to organize trade unions for collective bargaining and political education. They saw that potential in the dark days of the 1870s and 1880s, when wages were miserably low, when poverty was widespread, when Pinkerton agents were experts in breaking unions, when court injunctions were commonly used to break strikes.

And they continued to see that potential—and continued to work for improvements—in the 1920s and 1930s, before the Wagner Act established the promotion of collective bargaining as national policy.

The American labor movement had the vision to accept the challenge of America—the opportunity to utilize the constitutional rights of individuals and free institutions to seek and achieve improvements within the basic structure of our society.

In the process, trade unions have served to humanize the economic system. And, in humanizing it, they have made it stronger and more prosperous through the development of broader mass markets for the sale of the products of industry.

GEORGE MEANY, President of the AFL-CIO, delivered this address to the 50th Anniversary World Convocation of the National Industrial Conference Board in New York City in September.

It is useful to recall that only 37 years ago the American economy came close to collapsing. At the lowest point of the Great Depression, about half of our productive capacity was idle. About 25 percent of the labor force was unemployed and many more were working part-time for miserably low wages. Farmers were bankrupt and banks closed down.

The seeds of depression were sown in the unbridled "prosperity" of the 1920s. Profits and dividends had skyrocketed. Speculation had been rampant. The workers' share of national production had declined. The AFL—battered by employer attacks—had less than three million members. In that top-heavy, lopsided economy of the 1920s, workers and the consuming public in general had been left behind in the speculative frenzy.

The goverment's economic philosophy of that period was stated bluntly by President Calvin Coolidge when he declared: "The business of government is business." Such a statement caused little surprise at the time. It was just a candid expression of the dominant view in both business and government for most of the previous 60 years.

The New Deal sought to revive the economy by restoring social and economic balance. Most of the New Deal reforms—with their emphasis on people and public welfare—actually should have been undertaken many years before.

I think history now supports the view that the New Deal, far from undermining the American system, actually saved it, despite the bitter opposition that emanated from the business community. The New Deal redefined the role of government as the protector of the total public interest. And it tried to promote the welfare of all the people—workers as well as business.

Its innovations improved and strengthened the economic system. But at each step of the way, they were denounced as the wild-eyed ideas of dangerous radicals.

The same kind of resistance has greeted the new programs of the 1960s—medicare, the war on poverty, aid to education, health and community rehabilitation.

Only recently, the AFL-CIO was accused of trying to plant the seeds of communism by espousing Medicare. Thirty years earlier, the same charge was hurled when the trade unions supported the original social security and minimum wage laws. And long ago, unions heard the same claim when they dared to seek the 8-hour day and passage of child labor, factory-inspection and workmen's compensation laws.

We heard these charges a long time ago. We hear them now and I guess we will hear them in the future.

Organized labor is hardened to negative opposition.

The AFL-CIO will continue its efforts as a free institution to advance the cause of democracy under freedom. Day by day and year by year, we will continue to seek a better life for workers and for the nation as a whole.

I take a great deal of pride, as President of the AFL-CIO, in our role in national affairs. We have served as the advocate—the lobby, if you please—not only for organized workers, but for those without voice, power or privilege who have no other effective spokesman in the decision-making process.

Take an old issue—workmen's compensation. It is on the statute books of every state. It is an achievement of the trade union movement. But it benefits every person who works for wages, not only union members. And our economic system is stronger for it.

Or take a current issue—minimum wages. The AFL-CIO has fought for the much improved federal minimum wage law that extends protection to millions of low-wage workers and increases the minimum above $1.25 an hour.

My union doesn't need this law. Nor do the Auto Workers or the Electricians. But there are millions of people, who are not members of unions, who need the protection of the minimum wage and an increase in the minimum wage. They have no other spokesman. We are proud to represent them in this effort—the most important single step that can be taken to wipe out poverty.

Of course, trade unions have other basic functions as well. In tens of thousands of workplaces across this land, they bring democracy to the job. Whenever workers participate in deciding the issues that affect their working lives, a sense of personal dignity is achieved and their regard for freedom is enhanced.

The first-class citizenship on the job that only unionism confers helps create first-class producers and makes first-class Americans as well.

And it is too often forgotten that the reward for most work was little more than a subsistence wage not many years ago. In "prosperous" 1929, the average wage in manufacturing in this country was 56 cents per hour. Who then had heard of a standard 40- or 35-hour workweek, overtime pay, shift differentials, paid vacations, health plans, life insurance or pensions?

Organized labor has played a vital part in helping to lift the living standards of the average American worker to the highest level in the world. And, if I read corporate profit statements correctly, this rise in workers' earnings has not impaired the vitality or affluence of American industry.

American business has prospered through mass markets.

Unless the ever-rising tide of goods that American enterprise can produce is matched by the increased real earnings of workers, these goods cannot be sold. Our mass production system must be matched and supported by mass consumption. The higher take-home pay that unions seek is indispensable to the sustained growth of production, jobs and profits in this ever more productive American economy.

Nevertheless, it has been claimed that unions are too successful; they are just too strong. To weaken them, it has been proposed that collective bargaining be restricted to the local scene—each local union with its local employer—and that any other kind of union activity should be outlawed.

This totally ignores the essential facts of life about collective bargaining in the American economy. Collective bargaining reflects the changing character of the business enterprise with which unions negotiate—the changing nature of the American economy.

This economy has long since passed the day when the dominant form of enterprise was a small farm or a small, local business. Most of our industries are national in scope—they produce for national or at least regional markets. Vast, multi-unit corporations increasingly dominate the American scene. A recent article in Fortune magazine points out that the 500 largest industrial corporations account for 60 percent of all industrial employment and sales and for 70 percent of all profits.

In this kind of economy, legal restrictions to limit collective bargaining to local unions and local plants would simply undermine, if not destroy, the effectiveness of the collective bargaining system. Obviously, that is what the advocates of such proposals want.

But there is no alternative in a free, industrial society to free trade unions and collective bargaining. I do not maintain, of course, that trade unions have achieved perfection or that the system of collective bargaining is without flaws. No human institutions are in that category. However, I know of no substitute, in a free society, for the right of workers to belong to trade unions that can bargain effectively with employers.

Take free trade unions and free collective bargaining out of the picture and you no longer have the American economic system or a free social order.

There is no uniform way, in these United States, in which unions and employers bargain. There is no centralized authority on collective bargaining methods and practices.

There are over 14 million members of AFL-CIO unions. But collective bargaining policies are wholly decided by the 129 autonomous, self-governing national and international unions affiliated with the federation and by their 60,000 local unions. These 129 national unions and 60,000 local unions bargain with tens of thousands of employers throughout the land. And they negotiate about 150,000 collective bargaining agreements.

The large number of agreements is the result of the great diversity in bargaining practices. This variety of collective bargaining methods is largely a mirror of the variety of economic structures in the nation. Each union obviously developed after the establishment of its trade or industry and it has patterned its collective bargaining methods on the facts of life in each different industry.

This process of collective bargaining between free trade unions and employers involves the right to strike. Collective bargaining means that workers join together to say, in effect, to the employer: "We don't like the conditions, we don't like the wages, we don't like the hours, we want a better deal." And if collective bargaining is meaningful, it presupposes the right to strike—the right to stop working for the profit of another under conditions the workers don't like.

That is part of the collective bargaining process. Without it, there is no free collective bargaining. Moreover, if the government takes away the right to strike by forcing free men to work against their will, the government also destroys the basis on which the enterprise or industry operates for the profit of private investors.

No trade union leader worthy of his salt prefers a strike to an orderly and peaceful settlement. And very few workers prefer strikes and the sacrifice of income that is involved. Actual experience indicates that strikes are almost always a collective bargaining weapon of last resort, when workers and their unions decide that there is no other choice.

Look at the record. In recent years, only two percent of collective bargaining agreements have been affected by strikes and only about two-tenths of one percent of total work-time has been lost as a result of work stoppages. Eight times as much has been lost from accidents and illness.

The record proves that 98 percent of collective bargaining negotiations in recent years resulted in peaceful settlements.

That's not a bad record at all. Obviously, we should try to improve it, to do a little better. We all want to make the collective bargaining process work better than it does. But it is utterly destructive of economic freedom itself to destroy the right to strike.

Does the right to strike—and the exercise of that right—mean that unions want to put the employer out of business? Obviously, no. Does it mean that we want to do away with profits? Once again, the answer is no. All it means is that unions want a fair share for workers who make their contribution to the economic system, And it means that unions are going to continue to seek a fair share through every legal method, including strikes, when necessary.

In other words, we think that the American economic system, with its potential for progress, works quite well. We see no better system anywhere in the world today or in the history of the past.

This does not mean that we of organized labor believe we have reached the millenium. There are many unresolved problems—there always are and always will be.

One of these problems today is the continued failure to achieve full employment of the labor force. True enough, we are now doing much better than in the decade after 1953. Unemployment is now lower than it has been in many years. But there is still a hard-core of jobless people—particularly among the young, among the unskilled with little, if any, education or training and among Negroes.

Moreover, certain trends present a serious threat to the kind of balance required for sustained economic growth. Business investment in new plants and machines is in the third year of a super-boom that cannot continue. The installation of these new and automated plants and machines is increasing productive capacity much faster than the demand for goods and services can grow under ordinary conditions. So the potential for a big gap between the economy's ability to produce and its ability to buy is developing.

In a misguided attempt to slow down this boom, the Federal Reserve's policies have raised interest rates to the highest levels in more than a generation. These rates do not seem to have slowed down business investment in new plants and machines. But they are increasing the cost of loans and they are increasing prices all along the line. And they have cut home building down to the lowest level since 1961 at a time when we really need a vast effort to rebuild our cities.

At the same time, the fires that feed this unbalanced capital goods boom continue. From 1960 to 1965, corporate profits rose 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes—while total wage, salary and fringe benefit payments increased only 33 percent.

Another group of problems arises from the rapid and radical changes that are taking place all around us—in technology, in the growth of metropolitan areas, in race relations.

With the spread of automation, productivity is rising at a very rapid pace—50 percent faster in the postwar years than in the period between the two world wars. The technological revolution is reducing manpower requirements, changing the location of industries and the character of the workforce.

In the first half of this year, there were 2.2 million fewer people working on American farms than in 1953, only 13 years ago. In the wake of the technological revolution, hundreds of thousands of farmers, farmworkers and their families left the rural areas to seek homes and jobs in the cities at a time when automation was reducing labor requirements in other key parts of the economy. Many of them were Negroes, with poor education and confronted by discrimination in housing and employment. So our metropolitan areas expanded rapidly, with growing pockets of poverty and unemployment.

At the same time, mining and railroad employment fell sharply. The number of soft coal miners has dropped almost 160,000 from 1953—a drop of over 50 percent. And railroad employment has declined almost 50 percent or close to 600,000.

After 1953, factory employment also declined. The sharp pick-up of industrial production in the past three years brought a substantial improvement. And in recent months, factory employment has finally bounced back to where it had been 13 years ago.

This is only a small part of the story. It leaves out the changes in skills and materials, the upgrading of some jobs and downgrading of others. It also leaves out the continuing spread of automation at a fast pace, while the number of youngsters entering the labor force is greater than ever before.

We are also confronted by the vast growth of metropolitan areas and the pressing need to rebuild our cities.

Each year, the population increases by 2½ million or more, the size of a very large city. And, each year, tens of thousands of people move off the farms, out of the rural areas, into the cities.

In 1955, less than 60 percent of the population lived in the 212 major metropolitan areas, occupying less than 10 percent of the land area of the country. Today, that figure is about 70 percent. By 1985, it is expected to reach 80 percent of a far greater population. Moreover, by 1985 almost one-half of all Americans will live in three super-metropolitan regions of the country—between Boston and Washington, between Buffalo and Milwaukee and between San Diego and San Francisco.

The need for housing, schools, mass transit, clean air and water, recreation and other facilities and services demands progressive legislation and far heavier public expenditures for such facilities and services than have ever been provided in the past. We of organized labor insist that such massive efforts are a vital, necessary public investment in the future of America and its people.

The Negro citizens of this country also are demanding their full civil right to enter the mainstream of American society and to share fully in the abundance that the economy can produce.

Decades of neglect, prejudice and discrimination have left a massive problem, particularly when automation is wiping out large numbers of unskilled and semi-skilled jobs in farming and industry.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 are giant steps in the struggle for true democracy and for the redemption of America from the shame of discrimination and injustice. The right of every citizen, regardless of creed or color, to equal access to public accommodations, equal opportunity for employment and the equal exercise of voting rights, free of intimidation or evasive devices, is now the law of the land.

I am proud to say that the AFL-CIO was in the forefront of the campaign to secure enactment of these laws and was in the forefront of the unsuccessful effort to enact the new civil rights bill of 1966. The AFL-CIO will stay in the front of the fight to improve and perfect those laws and to ensure that they are fully and vigorously enforced.

Adjustments to these social and economic changes—and achievement of full employment as well as a better balance in the economy—are needed if we are to preserve the American system. In the world of the 1960s, we cannot afford to sit and wait for a crisis to compel us to do what should be done, now.

But no one group alone can meet these problems. Government action and cooperative efforts of all sectors of the population are required.

The successes of the past indicate the continued great potential of the American system. And I am convinced that organized labor, with all of its weaknesses, imperfections and occasional mistakes, has contributed much to the flexibility and strength of this system.

However, we have to move ahead. There is no canned ideology—communist, fascist or other—that can give us workable solutions, within a free society, to the problems of today and tomorrow.

Yet I have faith and confidence that these challenges can be met successfully—through the exercise of our liberties, our free institutions, our wisdom and our hopefully growing mutual tolerance.

Trial of Bobby Baker May Illustrate Dealings Of Politics & Business Government Says S&Ls' Cash Ended Up in His Pockets; Kerr-Baker Relationship

By JERRY LANDAUER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Whether or not the Bobby Baker case broadens into a wider influence-peddling scandal, the trial may—if the Government proves its case—wind up portraying the former secretary to the Senate's Democrats as an artful bluffer who enriched himself by $100,000 in political contributions intended for lawmakers from bigwigs of the savings and loan industry.

Robert G. Baker's trial started yesterday in Federal district court here before a jury of six men and six women who will be locked up overnight and on weekends to shield them against prejudicial publicity. The jury will determine whether the onetime "barefoot boy" from Pickens, S.C., (he shed the given name Bobby Gene while moving up the political ladder to become Senate Democratic Leader Lyndon Johnson's top aide at age 30) committed fraud, theft, conspiracy and income tax evasion in parlaying his $20,000-a-year job into claimed assets of $1.5 million.

The nub of the Justice Department's case against Mr. Baker involves the $100,000 that allegedly came from savings and loan executives in California.

According to the indictment, the money started flowing in the fall of 1962, just a year before disclosure of Bobby's outside business activities forced Democratic Senators to bounce him. On Oct. 21, 1962, Mr. Baker assertedly received $50,000 from Stuart Davis, then a director and now chairman of Great Western Financial Corp. Ten days later, the indictment states, John F. Marten, then president of Great Western, came East with $17,000 more, again in cash. Finally, it's charged, on Nov. 9, 1962, Bobby flew West to receive $33,000 more from S. Mark Taper, then and now chairman of First Charter Financial Corp.

Government-Business Relations

Why did the business executives give the cash to Bobby and what did he do with it? Some answers to those questions are available and will be forthcoming as the trial unfolds. Quite aside from Mr. Baker's guilt or innocence, the answers will illuminate Government-business relations and, more specifically, shed light on what certain businessmen believe can be done to influence Government decision-making.

It happens that in the summer of 1962 the California capital stock savings and loan associations felt they were in deep trouble. (The stock associations are owned by their stockholders, unlike the more common mutual associations, which are owned by their depositors; Great Western and First Charter are among the biggest stock S&L holding companies.) President Kennedy's big tax reform bill that year proposed to end the near-exemption from Federal taxes they and other thrift institutions were enjoying; it sought to reduce the amount of earnings that could be transferred to tax-free bad-debt reserves.

As the complex tax measure moved through Congress, a special problem cropped up for the California stock associations. While the House bill granted equal tax treatment to the stock and mutual associations, in the Senate Finance Committee the late Sen. Robert Kerr of Oklahoma attached an amendment that would, so the stock associations protested, have crippled them.

Chance of Higher Taxes

Under his amendment, mutual S&Ls would have been permitted to place 60% of taxable income in a tax-free, bad-debt reserve; stockholder-owned associations could not have transferred more than 50%. If put into law, this discriminatory treatment would have cost the stock companies at least $10 million a year more in taxes.

The bill containing the Kerr amendment cleared the Senate on Aug. 7, 1962, and headed for a conference with House tax-writers to resolve differences. On Sept. 25, the conferees knocked out the Kerr amendment, restoring the stock associations to parity of treatment with the mutuals. The House and Senate approved the bill's final version Oct. 2 and President Kennedy signed it Oct. 16. Five days later, the Government's indictment states, Great Western's Mr. Davis came to Washington with the first bundle of cash for Bobby Baker. Mr. Davis is a registered Republican.

The Justice Department doesn't accuse Messrs. Davis, Marten or Taper of wrongdoing, and the executives or their attorneys emphatically reject suggestions that Bobby was paid for services rendered. "He came to collect a political contribution," First Charter's Mr. Taper will testify, speaking of the $33,000 Bobby picked up from him in Los Angeles; according to the Government, this sum was passed on or about Nov. 9, three days after the 1962 Congressional elections.

Mr. Taper explains that the political kitty, to which various S&L executives contributed, was "for a Senatorial campaign fund for a lot of Senators on both sides," meaning Republicans and Democrats. Mr. Taper declines to identify the intended recipients, and he cuts off further conversation when asked why the secretary to Senate Democrats collected campaign cash for Republicans, too.

"The Way Thing Are Done"

Mr. Taper's attorney, Joseph A. Ball, insists there's nothing at all unusual about making contributions to political campaigns in hard cash; "that's the way things are done," he confides. "I've known Mark Taper for 15 years," says Mr. Ball, a highly regarded Los Angeles attorney who was senior staff counsel to the Warren Commission investigation of President Kennedy's assassination. "If Mark gives less than $1,000 he does it by check. If he gives more, it's with cash."

Mr. Ball adds that eight or 10 Senators were supposed to benefit from Mr. Baker's collections; "the Government knows their names and everything else about it." It's possible Mr. Baker may have told the donors this story, but whether the Senators knew they were tabbed for political contributions from unexpected sources seems questionable. In opening his presentation to the jury yesterday, chief prosecutor William O. Bittman said the Government expects to show that at least $80,000 of the $100,000 went into various Baker bank accounts and stayed there.

As Mr. Bittman recalled, Bobby Baker was particularly hard-pressed for money in that fall of 1962, chiefly to finance construction of the Carousel Motel, an Ocean City, Md., hostelry that a score of Senators helped Bobby open shortly thereafter amid popping champagne corks.

About this time, in the prosecutor's words, Bobby told this story to Kenneth Childs, then the president of Home Savings & Loan Association, a $2 billion holding company: "The savings and loan business isn't making political contributions the way it should. Why don't you get on the bandwagon so you'll have friends in Washington? Go back and talk to your people." Apparently that suggestion found favor in California, much to Bobby's satisfaction. According to the prosecutor, when Mr. Davis handed the first $50,000 to Bobby in a Washington hotel, the Senate majority secretary thanked him and said, "The Senators will really appreciate it."

What lent weight to Bobby's words was his well-known intimacy with Sen. Kerr, the uncrowned king of the Senate. Mr. Kerr's political influence expanded steadily after Lyndon Johnson left as Democratic leader to become Vice President in January 1961, and as Sen. Kerr's power swelled so did Bobby Baker's.

Fred Black, one of Mr. Baker's business associates, has described the relationship between the hulking Oklahoma Senator and the slim secretary to the Democratic Senators. "Sen. Kerr told me that there wasn't anything in the world he wouldn't do for Bobby Baker if he had the power to do it."

The Kerr-Baker relationship flowered further in the summer of 1962 when, according to some Senate liberals, Bobby helped the Senator defeat the Kennedy Administration's medicare bill by a cliff-hanging 52-48 vote. The Oklahoman fought medicare stubbornly, for it would have replaced the Kerr-Mills Medical Assistance Program, the only law that carried the Senator's name. In turn, perhaps, Mr. Kerr returned the favor on the big tax bill, which he guided through the Senate.

One ranking savings and loan executive who was privy to what occurred says the tax amendment Mr. Kerr aimed at the stock associations was intended at least in part to spur the flow of political money from the industry in California. "It was a 'cinch amendment,'" this executive says, "put in to hurt people who could afford to get it knocked out."

TO MEMBERS OF THE POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION:

Dear Friend:

Because of your interest in political and legislative affairs, I am sending you the enclosed copy of "Labor Looks at the 89th Congress," an AFL-CIO legislative report on the two-year record of the most progressive, productive, outstanding Congress in our nation's history.

The report covers a wide variety of issues in which the AFL-CIO has an interest -- labor legislation, reapportionment, general welfare problems, civil rights, employment and the economy, natural resources, and congressional reform.

If you would like to have additional copies of this pamphlet, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

FOREWORD

The 89th Congress was the most progressive Congress in history. What it accomplished in the last two years will enrich the lives of all Americans for generations to come.

These accomplishments must be both protected and broadened.

It will be the responsibility of all who cherish this record to insist that the 90th Congress protect all of these new legislative accomplishments and, in particular, safeguard them against the strangulation of inadequate appropriations. In addition, the 90th Congress should complete the unfinished business of progress which the historic 89th Congress left undone.

The election results will make these goals more difficult to achieve. But the trade union movement has never shirked, nor will it shirk, difficult jobs.

The election results have not changed the problems that still face America—such problems as poverty in the midst of affluence; as the persistence of racial discrimination; as the still-unmet needs of the educational system; as the inequities in federal labor laws; as the vast and complex challenges posed by urban America, and many more.

These problems will face the 90th Congress just as they faced its predecessor, for while some of them have been ameliorated, none of them has been solved.

The American people, we firmly believe, are committed to the solution of these problems. Certainly we in the AFL-CIO are so committed, for we are dedicated to the endless quest for the ultimate perfection of American society. We will work with undiminished vigor toward that end, and we are confident that the cause of progress will prevail.

LABOR LEGISLATION

Repeal of Section 14(b)

Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act authorizes state "right-to-work" laws prohibiting union security agreements reached through free collective bargaining between labor and management. Such laws exist in 19 states.

In 1965 the House passed a bill to repeal Section 14(b). However, the Senate, blocked by a Republican-Dixiecrat filibuster, failed to complete action on the bill during the 89th Congress.

The House Labor Subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) held hearings May 24-June 8, 1965 on the Thompson bill to repeal 14(b), HR 77. On June 9 the subcommittee approved the bill, 6-3, for action by the full House Education and Labor Committee. The six Democratic members of the subcommittee voted for the bill; the three Republican members voted against it.

The full House Education and Labor Committee approved HR 77 on June 10 and reported the bill on June 22 for House floor action. The 21-10 vote in the committee closely followed party lines. Voting for the bill were 19 Democrats and 2 Republicans. Voting against were 8 Republicans and 2 Southern Democrats.

The chairman of the House Rules Committee was Dixiecrat Congressman Howard Smith (D-Va.). To bypass his roadblock to repeal of Section 14(b), Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, filed a resolution June 23 to bring HR 77 directly to the House floor under the 21-day rule. (See House Rules Committee.) On July 26 Chairman Powell brought up on the House floor a rule for consideration on HR 77 with five hours of debate. Under the House rules, only germane amendments are allowed.

The first test vote came on a motion by Powell to stop debate on the rule and bring it up for a vote.

On a roll call vote July 26, 1965 the House adopted a procedural motion for consideration of the 14(b) repeal bill.

Voting for consideration of the bill 248

Voting against consideration of the bill 171
(45 Democrats, 126 Republicans)

The rule was then adopted by voice vote. House debate on the bill continued until June 28. Various amendments were offered but all except one were ruled out of order as non-germane. Voted down was an amendment to postpone the effective date of the bill.

On July 28, at the conclusion of debate, the House rejected a motion by Rep. Robert Griffin (R-Mich.) to recommit and thus to kill HR 77.

On a roll call vote July 28, 1965 the House defeated the recommittal motion.

Voting for recommittal, against repeal 200

The third key House vote came the same day on final passage.

On a roll call vote July 28, 1965 the House voted passage of the 14(b)-repeal bill.

In the Senate, hearings on S. 256, a bill identical to HR 77, were held June 22 to June 25, 1965 by the Senate Labor Subcommittee headed by Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), the bill's sponsor. On August 12 the subcommittee approved HR 77 by a 7-1 vote after adding an amendment permitting an individual or member of a religious sect opposed to union membership to be exempted from union membership requirements if the individual agreed to pay the equivalent of union dues into a charitable fund. The full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee approved this amended version of HR 77 by a 12-3 vote on Sept. 1 and reported the bill out on Sept. 9 for Senate floor action.

Senate debate started Oct. 4, 1965 on a motion by Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mich.) to make HR 77 the pending business of the Senate. From the outset, Senate Republican Leader Dirksen made it clear that the anti-14(b)-repeal coalition of conservative Republicans and conservative Democrats would filibuster against this motion and against the bill itself.

To draw the lines more clearly between the anti-repeal and pro-repeal forces in the Senate, Mansfield moved on Oct. 8 to kill his own motion to make HR 77 the pending business of the Senate. However, Dirksen and his anti-repeal coalition voted against the Mansfield motion. Thus, the 94-0 vote on the motion was turned into a meaningless vote by Dirksen, who feared a majority vote against killing the Mansfield motion would show that a majority of the Senate favored repeal of Section 14(b). Senator Mansfield then filed a cloture petition.

On a roll call vote Oct. 11, 1965 the Senate failed to break the filibuster against repeal of Sec. 14(b).

The votes of two-thirds of the senators present and voting are necessary to invoke cloture and cut off a filibuster. On Oct. 11 the 45 pro-repeal votes were far short of the maximum 67 votes needed for cloture. However, some senators who voted against cloture supported repeal of Section 14(b) and a number of pro-repeal senators were absent at the time of the cloture vote.

The day after the Oct. 11 cloture vote, the Senate Democratic leadership gave up the effort to pass HR 77 in the 1965 session. Pro-repeal senators reiterated their determination to get a vote in 1966 on repeal of Section 14(b) and President Johnson and Vice President Humphrey made it clear that repeal of Section 14(b) would have high administration priority in the 1966 session of the 89th Congress.

Early in 1966 President Johnson again called for repeal of Section 14(b) in his State of the Union message and in his budget and economic messages to the Congress.

On Jan. 24, 1966 the Senate started debate on a Mansfield motion to make HR 77 the pending business of the Senate. The Dirksen-led Republican-Dixiecrat coalition immediately began a filibuster and used other obstructionist parliamentary maneuvers to prevent a vote on the Mansfield motion. After two weeks, the Senate was still 15 votes short of the two-thirds majority needed to cut off the filibuster.

On a roll call vote Feb. 8, 1966, the Senate again failed to break a filibuster against repeal of Sec. 14(b).

The third and final cloture vote two days later likewise was unsuccessful. Senator McGovern (D-S.Dak.) was the only senator whose position changed—from pro-cloture to anti-cloture.

On a roll call vote Feb. 10, 1966 the Senate made a final unsuccessful attempt to break the anti-labor filibuster against repeal of Sec. 14(b).

The Dirksen-led Republican-Dixiecrat filibusters against repeal of Sec. 14(b) were the first filibusters in the history of the Senate against taking a bill that had come to the Senate calendar after going through all the normal, orderly committee processes of the Senate.

Prior to the Feb. 10 vote, Senator Mansfield announced that defeat of his motion would kill HR 77 in the Senate for the rest of the 1966 session. After the Feb. 10 cloture vote there was no further Senate action on legislation to repeal Sec. 14(b).

Veto of Guam R-T-W Bill—On October 17, 1966 President Johnson vetoed a "right to work" law passed by the legislature of Guam. The governor of Guam had previously vetoed the bill, but the legislature on July 12 passed it again over his veto.

In a letter explaining his veto, President Johnson declared:

"For more than 30 years it has been the expressed national policy of the United States government to encourage free collective bargaining between employers and organizations of their employes. Such free collective bargaining has helped to raise wage and employment standards, lower working hours, improve safety practices, and in many ways assist the advancement of the economic condition of working men and women. It is fair to say that one of the strong foundations of the prosperity which has been enjoyed by working men and women and their employers in the United States over the past 30 years is the existence of an effective labor movement.

"In my opinion, the bill before me will inhibit development of the free collective bargaining which our national policy seeks to encourage. The development of free collective bargaining in Guam will tend to protect and advance the economy of Guam and the welfare of working men and women in Guam."

Fair Labor Standards

In 1966 the 89th Congress passed the best Fair Labor Standards bill since the federal wage-hour law was passed in 1938. AFL-CIO President George Meany called the measure "the most potent single weapon in the war on poverty" enacted during the 89th Congress.

President Johnson, on May 18, 1965, called for action by the 89th Congress to improve the Fair Labor Standards Act by: (1) extending FLSA protections to an additional 4.5 million workers and (2) requiring payment of double-time for hours worked per week in accordance with a schedule starting at 48 hours and ending 4 years later at 45 hours per week. He also proposed, but left to Congress the amount of, a minimum wage increase.

The AFL-CIO supported the President's proposals on extension of coverage but urged substantially broader coverage. The AFL-CIO urged Congress to establish a $2 an hour minimum wage as the most effective means of fighting poverty. Even if Congress did not move in one step to $2, the AFL-CIO urged that it be made a goal to be achieved in a few quick steps.

In regard to overtime, the AFL-CIO recommended that the double-time premium be paid after 40 hours rather than after 48 or eventually 45 hours. The AFL-CIO estimated that the increase in the overtime penalty to double-time, coupled with extension of coverage of FLSA, would result in making available to unemployed workers as many as a million additional jobs.

The AFL-CIO also urged a shorter workweek—specifically, a 35-hour week—to help solve problems of continued high unemployment, technological displacement, and a rapidly growing labor force.

The House Labor Subcommittee, then headed by Representative James Roosevelt (D-Calif.), reported FLSA legislation on Aug. 4, 1965, to the full House Education and Labor Committee. The subcommittee bill brought agricultural labor under the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act for the first time.

The bill, as reported by the House Labor Committee on Aug. 25, 1965, was a good, liberal bill. It would have raised the basic minimum wage in steps to $1.75 an hour, with a minimum wage of $1.25 by July 1, 1968 for farm workers, and it proposed FLSA protections for an additional 6.6 million non-agricultural workers, and 1.3 agricultural workers.

At the time the House Labor Committee report was filed, Chairman Adam Clayton Powell filed a resolution for consideration of the bill by the House to be brought up in the event the House Rules Committee should fail to give the bill a rule for its consideration on the House floor. When the House Rules Committee failed to act, consideration of the proposed rule was scheduled under the 21-day rule procedure for Oct. 11, 1965.

Rep. Roosevelt resigned from Congress Sept. 30, 1965 to accept appointment to the United Nations Economic and Social Council. Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.) became chairman of the House Labor Subcommittee previously headed by Roosevelt. Because the House leadership believed the Roosevelt bill lacked the necessary votes in the House, further action on the bill was postponed until the 1966 session.

To win the votes needed for House passage, the Dent Labor Subcommittee approved a revised minimum wage bill sponsored by Dent and Rep. Alphonzo Bell (R-Calif.). As approved by the Dent subcommittee on Mar. 16, 1966, and by the full House Labor Subcommittee on Mar. 21, the bill called for step-ups in the minimum wage for currently covered workers from $1.25 an hour to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967 and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968. For newly covered non-farm workers the bill called for 15 cents an hour annual step-ups from a $1 minimum starting Feb. 1, 1967 to $1.60 an hour starting Feb. 1, 1971. For farm workers, annual step-ups were proposed raising the minimum from $1 starting Feb. 1, 1967 to $1.30 starting Feb. 1, 1969.

Before House approval of the committee bill, three major votes were taken. The first was on an amendment proposed by Rep. John Anderson (R-Ill.) to deny wage-hour protections to 1½ million retail and service workers.

On a roll call vote May 26, 1966 the House rejected the Anderson proposal.

A second vote was on an amendment proposed by Rep. William Ayres (R-Ohio) and Rep. Thomas Morris (D-N. Mex.) to delay the effective date of the $1.60 minimum to Feb. 1, 1969. The AFL-CIO strongly opposed this stretch-out amendment.

On a key roll call vote May 26, 1966 the House passed the Ayres-Morris amendment.

The third major vote was on a motion by Rep. Dave Martin (R-Neb.) to knock out of the bill the new coverage for farm workers and to weaken overtime protections for agricultural processing workers.

On a roll call vote May 26, 1966 the House defeated the Martin motion.
Voting for minimum wage protection for farm workers 231
(195 Democrats, 36 Republicans)
Voting against wage protection for farm workers 168
(77 Democrats, 91 Republicans)

After these three major votes, the House passed the bill, 303-93, on May 26, 1966.

The Senate Labor Subcommittee headed by Senator Pat McNamara (D-Mich.) completed hearings on minimum wage legislation in July 1965, but the subcommittee deferred further action pending House passage of the minimum wage bill. Senator Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) became chairman of the Senate Labor Subcommittee after the death of Senator McNamara on April 30, 1966.

The Senate Labor Subcommittee on July 15, 1966 and the full Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee on Aug. 23 approved a version of the minimum wage bill which was substantially similar to the House-passed version, although the Senate committee stood firm against the two-year stretch-out to reach the $1.60 minimum.

Senate floor action on the minimum wage legislation started Aug. 23, 1966. More than 20 amendments were considered and voted on during the four days of Senate debate. Two key amendments supported by an anti-labor Republican-Dixiecrat coalition were defeated.

One of these amendments was proposed by Senator Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) to restore the two-year stretch-out approved by the House. This would have postponed the $1.60 minimum until Feb. 1, 1969. It was an effort to reverse the Senate Labor Committee action.

On a roll call vote August 25, 1966 the Senate rejected the Fannin amendment.

The second key amendment was proposed by Senate Republican Leader Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.) to take away FLSA coverage from 1 million workers in retail and service enterprises with a gross annual sales of less than $500,000. The Dirksen amendment was defeated by a tie vote.

On a roll call vote August 26, 1966 the Senate rejected the Dirksen amendment.

The Senate voted passage of the bill, 57-17, on Aug. 26. The Senate-House conference committee report, including the Feb. 1, 1968 starting date for the $1.60 minimum, was approved by the House, 260-89, on Sept. 7, 1966. Before approval of the conference report, the House rejected a Republican proposal by Congressman Ayres to stand fast for the stretch-out to Feb. 1, 1969 for the $1.60 minimum.

On a roll call vote September 7, 1966 the House rejected the Ayres stretch-out proposal.

Voting for the minimum wage stretch-out 163

Voting against the minimum wage stretch-out 183

The Senate approved the conference committee report, 95-38, on Sept. 14, 1966. President Johnson signed the bill into law on Sept. 23, 1966.

Summary—For 29½ million currently covered workers, the federal minimum wage goes up from $1.25 an hour to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967 and to $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1968. This raises total FLSA coverage to 38 million workers.

For some 7½ million newly covered non-farm workers, the minimum wage will be $1.00 an hour, starting Feb. 1, 1967. The minimum will rise 15 cents an hour each year until it reached the $1.60 on Feb. 1, 1971.

mum wage will start at $1.00 an hour on Feb. 1, 1967, go to $1.15 on Feb. 1, 1968, and increase to $1.30 on Feb. 1, 1969. The legal

For some 390,000 newly covered agricultural workers, the mini-minimum wage stops at this level for farm workers.

The volume of business test for enterprises covered by FLSA was cut from $1 million a year to $500,000 a year starting Feb. 1, 1967 and to $250,000 starting Feb. 1, 1969. Laundry and cleaning enterprises and construction firms are covered without regard to this test.

Also covered are public and private hospitals, public and private schools, colleges and universities (except for teachers and administrative personnel), and retail and service enterprises. Hotels, motels, restaurants, and food services in retail and service establishments are covered under the minimum wage provision, but not yet under the maximum hours provision. Taxicab companies and local transit operations are covered by the minimum wage, but their operating employees are excluded from maximum hours protection.

Farm workers will get minimum wage protection if the employer used more than 500 man-days of hired farm labor in any calendar quarter during the preceding calendar year. Wage-hour protections for workers in agricultural processing are broadened.

The logging crew wage-hour exemption was cut from 12 to 8 employes.

Federal "blue collar" wage board employes and workers in non-appropriated fund activities under armed services jurisdiction are covered, as are workers under service contracts or subcontracts with the federal government.

D.C. Minimum Wage

The 89th Congress passed a minimum wage law for the District of Columbia, thus giving wage-hour protection to some 70,000 workers in jobs not covered by FLSA, plus more than 200,000 newly covered under federal law, but at a lower wage rate. The AFL-CIO had long sought enactment of an effective minimum wage law for the District.

The new law sets the District of Columbia minimum wage at $1.25 an hour, starting Feb. 1, 1967, at $1.40 a year later, and at $1.60 starting Feb. 1, 1969. The timetable for hotel and restaurant workers will be six months later. For D.C. workers in jobs covered by FLSA the federal minimum will apply whenever it is higher than the D.C. minimum.

The new law allows industry wage boards to set some rates higher than the minimum. It requires, with some exceptions, overtime pay for more than 42 hours of work a week, starting Feb. 1, 1967, and 40 hours starting Aug. 1, 1967.

Minimum wages for women and children in the District have been set previously by industry wage boards under a 1918 law. The new D.C. minimum wage law extends protection to men for the first time. Domestics remain unprotected by the new D.C. minimum wage law.

The House on June 28, 1965 passed a very modest bill which would have taken three years to reach the $1.25 minimum. The Senate passed a more liberal version Jan. 20, 1966. The Senate-

House conference committee compromise bill was approved by both houses on Oct. 4, 1966. President Johnson signed the bill into law on Oct. 17, 1966.

Airlines Strike

On July 8, 1966, after ten months of negotiations between the International Association of Machinists and the management of five major airlines, 36,000 airline mechanics and ground crew members went on strike against the companies which carry some 60 percent of the nation's commercial air transportation.

An earlier walkout had been postponed April 23, 1966 after President Johnson invoked the Railway Labor Act to delay strike action for 60 days. The President appointed a special emergency board to mediate the airline dispute, with Senator Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) as chairman. IAM negotiators rejected the board's proposals. This ended the pre-strike, 60-day "cooling-off" and mediation procedures available under the Railway Labor Act, which applies to railroads and airlines.

The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee met July 25 and voted to hold hearings to determine whether a national emergency existed. Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz, speaking for the Johnson Administration, said that a national emergency did not exist.

Machinists President P. L. Siemiller warned the Senate Labor Committee that any law designed to break the strike of airline mechanics would impair and weaken free collective bargaining. The chief negotiator for the airlines called for congressional legislation to break the machinists' strike.

AFL-CIO President George Meany urged the Senate to reject proposals for legislative strike-breaking. "If there is no right to strike, then there is no free collective bargaining," President Meany declared.

However, the Senate Labor Committee, after one day of hearings, voted 11-5 on July 28 to approve a bill sponsored by Senator Morse. The Morse bill, as approved by the committee, gave the President discretionary authority to order the striking machinists back to work for 60 days, plus authority to order two more 60-day no-strike periods. The original Morse bill would have ordered the striking workers back to their jobs for a 180-day period pending strike settlement efforts by a special board appointed by the President.

President Johnson called union and management negotiations to the White House July 29 for intensified bargaining. The negotiators reached an agreement which the President announced later the same day. IAM members rejected the settlement July 31 by a secret ballot vote of 17,251 to 6,587, a margin of nearly 3 to 1.

The Senate Labor Committee approved, 10-6, a revised bill which the Senate took up the same day, Aug. 1. The revised committee version authorized the President to order strikers back to work for a period or successive periods not to exceed 180 days. However, the Senate voted 51-36 to substitute another Morse compromise version for the committee-approved bill.

The bill passed by the Senate Aug. 4 was a compromise between those senators who wanted the Congress to break the strike and those senators who wanted the President to have the responsibility for breaking the strike. The bill contained (1) a 30-day back-to-work order, (2) a 60-day extension of the order at the President's option, to be triggered by his appointment of a special mediation panel, and (3) another 90-day no-strike period, if the special panel so advised and the President so decided.

On a key roll call vote August 4, 1966 the Senate passed the airlines anti-strike bill.

The House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee held hearings Aug. 5-10 on the Senate-passed measure and ordered it reported on Aug. 12 by a vote of 17 to 13.

"The right to strike is not an abstract theory," AFL-CIO President Meany declared during congressional consideration of anti-strike legislation. "Anyone who believes in the right to strike must accept the proposition that strikes will take place. It is not enough to believe in the right to strike in every case except the strike that is going on at the time or the strike that inconveniences articulate citizens.

"The AFL-CIO is unalterably opposed to any legislative measure forcing free men to work against their will for the profit of private investors," he declared. "No national emergency faces the United States. No evidence of any delay in moving national defense material has been offered. A vote for any such proposal can only be considered as anti-labor in character and a retaliation against the machinists, who acted as free men have every right to act."

During House Commerce Committee consideration of the bill IAM and airline negotiators resumed negotiations and agreed on a contract. Union airline mechanics and ground crew service workers employed at 231 airports approved a new three-year contract settlement by a secret ballot vote of 17,727 to 8,235 on Aug. 19, 1966, thus ending the 43-day airline strike. Following this settlement the House Rules Committee took no action on the Senate bill.

The airline anti-strike bill passed by the Senate and approved by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee included a provision directing the Secretary of Labor to report to the Congress by Jan. 15, 1967 on possible changes in the emergency labor dispute provisions of the Railway Labor Act and the Taft-Hartley Act. A similar provision sponsored by Senator Jacob Javits (R-N.Y.) and Senator Morse was included in the minimum wage bill by voice vote on Aug. 24, 1966, but the provision was dropped by the Senate-House conference committee.

Bonding of Union Officials

To stop discriminatory treatment of labor unions resulting from bonding requirements for union officials under the Landrum-Griffin Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act and the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act, the 89th Congress passed an AFL-CIO supported bonding bill.

The new bonding legislation cuts the cost of bonding union officials by correcting certain deficiencies in the bonding provisions of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. The bill amends the act by substituting for the present "faithful discharge" standard for bonding labor union officials a standard based on "acts of fraud or dishonesty." It permits the Secretary of Labor to exempt a union from a requirement of the act that its bonding must be placed through a corporate surety company holding a grant of authority from the Treasury Department when, in his opinion, it has made other bonding arrangements that protect the union as required by the act.

Surety companies are required to file certain reports under the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act with the Secretary of Labor with respect to (1) gross premiums and net premiums; (2) total claims paid; (3) total contingent claims; (4) administrative and legal expenses incurred in processing such claims; (5) amounts recovered by way of subrogation.

The House passed the bonding bill by voice vote on May 27, 1965 and the Senate passed the bill by voice vote on Sept. 14, 1965.

Service Contracts

In 1965 the 89th Congress set up new protections for workers employed by contractors to perform services for the federal government—as janitors or maintenance men, cafeteria or laundry workers, or in other service occupations.

Workers on federally aided construction contracts and workers on federal production contracts have had wage protection for many years under federal law. However, until passage of the Service Contracts Act of 1965, workers on federal service contracts did not have this kind of wage protection.

Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.) sponsored the service contracts bill which the House passed by voice vote on Sept. 20 and the Senate passed by voice vote on Oct. 1, 1965.

The Service Contracts Act requires employers providing service or maintenance work under federal contracts of $2,500 or more to pay their blue collar workers wages and fringe benefits—or the cash equivalent of the fringe benefits—that are at least equal to those paid or provided to other workers doing similar work in the locality. The new law also requires that all federal contract service workers must be paid at least the minimum wage required under the federal Fair Labor Standards Act—thus, in effect, extending minimum wage coverage to contracts under $2,500.

FLSA Coverage—The 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act extended FLSA protections to federal government workers and to workers employed under government service contracts. (See Fair Labor Standards.)

For workers already covered by the Service Contracts Act or by the Fair Labor Standards Act, the new law made the rates for presently covered workers applicable to these workers—not less than $1.40 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1967, and $1.60 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1968.

Workers who were not previously covered by either law, however, will have to be paid in conformity with the 1966 schedule for newly covered workers—not less than $1 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1967; not less than $1.15 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1968; not less than $1.30 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1969; not less than $1.45 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1970, and not less than $1.60 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1971.

Linen supply service workers employed under government service contracts are covered under the rates for newly covered employes unless more than 50 percent of their employer's work is government service contract work, in which case the schedule for presently covered workers applies to these workers.

Situs Picketing

In spite of widespread bipartisan support for "situs picketing" legislation supported by the AFL-CIO, the 89th Congress failed to act on this legislation after the chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee threw a one-man roadblock against a committee-approved "situs picketing" bill.

The 1951 Denver Building Trades decision by the Supreme Court made it illegal for a union to strike or throw a picket line around a construction site if an object of the activity is to keep unions not directly involved in the dispute off the job. This decision discriminated against building trades unions. It takes away from these unions basic economic rights enjoyed by other unions in other industries.

Proposals to reverse the Denver case interpretation of the Taft-Hartley ban on secondary boycotts have had bipartisan support in the Congress since 1949, the year of the National Labor Relations Board decision. The decision was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1951. In 1949 President Truman proposed legislation including "situs picketing" provisions. President Eisenhower's 1964 labor-management relations message to the Congress contained similar "situs picketing" proposals. The Kennedy Administration and the Johnson Administration likewise sought to eliminate "situs picketing" at multi-employer construction sites from the Taft-Hartley definition of secondary boycotts.

A complicating factor in the history of this legislation has been an internal dispute within the AFL-CIO. The divergence of views within the labor movement delayed congressional action. At the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in February 1965, the Building and Construction Trades Department and the Industrial Union Department announced agreement on "situs picketing" legislation.

The House Labor Subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) held hearings in June 1965 on a "situs picketing" bill sponsored by Rep. Carlton Sickles (D-Md.). On Sept. 21, 1965 the House Education and Labor Committee reported a revised version, including a section requiring a union to give a 10-day notice of intention to strike at any military facility engaged in defense or space work.

The House Rules Committee on March 14, 1966 reported a rule for consideration of the "situs picketing" bill on the floor of the House and the Speaker of the House, John W. McCormick (D-Mass.), scheduled the bill for House floor action on May 5, 1966.

However, in spite of earlier pledges to the Speaker and in defiance of basic democratic procedures, Congressman Adam Clayton Powell

(D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, blocked floor action by refusing to call up the bill.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council said Powell "constituted himself a one-man roadblock" in a "mockery of the democratic process" and demonstrated contempt for the binding obligations of a chairman.

The 89th Congress failed to take any further action on "situs picketing" legislation.

Joint Industry Promotion

Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley law prohibits all payments by employers to union representatives except certain enumerated types of payment, such as checked-off dues, and payments to specified kinds of employer-supported funds such as health and welfare funds.

The original general prohibition contained in Section 302 probably was not intended to cover joint labor-management industry promotion funds. However, court decisions have declared that employer contributions to trade and industry promotion funds administered jointly by trustees representing labor and management are prohibited under Section 302, although such industry promotion programs are not against the law.

A bill sponsored by then Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) would have added two more specific exemptions to Section 302—funds for the support of jointly administered "trade and industry" product promotion programs or jointly administered committees for the interpretation of collective bargaining agreements—thus legalizing such funds in the building and construction industry.

The House passed the bill by voice vote Aug. 10, 1965 and the measure was referred to the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

The Senate Labor Subcommittee held brief hearings on the bill in October 1966, but there was no further action on the bill in the 89th Congress.

Railroad Disputes and Grievances

A major improvement in the existing system of handling grievances in the railroad industry won approval in the 89th Congress. A bill to end delays, backlogs, and gross injustices in the grievance system became law in 1966.

Previously railroad workers with a grievance related to work rules or collective bargaining agreements often had to wait 10 years or more to get a final decision.

The new law makes railroad adjustment board decisions final and binding except for fraud. It also requires a special adjustment board when one party in a grievance dispute requests it.

The House passed the bill 380-0 on Feb. 9, 1966 and the Senate passed it by voice vote on June 7, 1966.

Railroad Work Rules Dispute

The Senate Commerce Committee held hearings in August 1965 on the effects of the two-year compulsory arbitration award in the railroad work rules dispute, imposed under Public Law 88-108, enacted by the 88th Congress in August 1963. The award itself expired in March 1966. The committee urged collective bargaining, not more compulsory arbitration, to settle future disputes in this area.

Florida East Coast Railway

A three-year-old strike by railroad workers against the Florida East Coast Railway received some help from the 89th Congress.

A loophole in the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 enabled the Alfred I. duPont Estate of Jacksonville, Florida, to control the Florida East Coast Railway and to impose anti-labor policies. When the 89th Congress moved to close the duPont-FEC loophole, workers were still striking against this railroad in a labor dispute that began on Jan. 23, 1963.

On Sept. 13, 1965 the House, under the 21-day-rule procedure, voted 201-171 to adopt a rule for consideration of a bill to put the duPont Estate under the Bank Holding Company Act.

The House passed the bill by voice vote Sept. 23, 1965, but unfortunately, added an amendment ending all major exemptions to the Bank Holding Company Act, including an exemption written into the act in 1956 which continued to permit unions to own and operate banks.

However, on June 7, 1966, the Senate adopted by voice vote an amended bill which ended the duPont exemption, but retained the labor bank exemption. The House accepted the Senate bill on June 21, 1966, and President Johnson signed it into law on July 1, 1966.

Passage of the law ending the duPont-FEC exemption means that the duPont Estate must give up either its banking or non-banking interests within five years. The effect of this requirement was support for the railroad workers involved in the FEC strike. The new measure was also an important trust-busting measure in the banking field.

This legislation had strong support from the AFL-CIO and the Railway Labor Executives Association.

Federal Pay Raise

In 1965 and again in 1966 the 89th Congress approved legislation raising the pay of postal workers and other federal employes. The threat of a presidential veto put restrictions on both pay raise actions.

The Federal Salary Reform Act of 1962 sets the principle that federal salaries should be comparable to wages and salaries paid in private industry. President Meany, who served on the President's Special Panel on Federal Salaries early in 1965, called for immediate full comparability in his dissent to the panel report. He also criticized "national wage and price policies." In his April 14, 1965 letter to President Johnson, President Meany declared:

"It is the position of the AFL-CIO that there are in fact no national wage and price policies, nor should there be in the absence of a war emergency. We believe wage and salary determinations, both private and government, should be made on the basis of objective facts, not on the theoretical projections of academic economists."

The 1965 federal pay law provided an across-the-board 3.6 percent pay raise for all federal classified, postal, legislative, and judicial employes, retroactive to Oct. 1, 1965. The 1965 law also contained important new fringe benefits, including liberalized postal overtime and relocation allowances, and, for the first time, a severance pay system for all federal civilian workers whose jobs are abolished.

The House on Sept. 30, 1965 voted 370-7 for a two-step pay bill providing an across-the-board 4 percent pay raise in October 1965, with a second step pay raise of 3 to 8 percent geared to private industry pay trends, effective in October 1966. Under the threat of a presidential veto, the Senate on October 22 passed, 67-0, a lower cost pay raise bill providing a one-step 3.6 pay raise. The Senate bill went back to the House on a take-it-or-leave-it basis in the last hours before adjournment of the 1965 session. The House accepted the Senate version, which the President signed Oct. 29, 1965.

In 1966, again under the threat of a presidential veto of a bigger pay raise, the Congress passed legislation to give federal workers an across-the-board increase of 2.9 percent, effective July 1, 1966. Increased fringe benefits, health benefits, and retirement benefits raised the cost of the package to about 3.2 percent.

The House passed the pay bill April 6, 1966 by a 393-1 vote. The Senate passed similar legislation July 11 by a vote of 81-0. The House accepted the Senate version July 12, 1966.

Life Insurance for Federal Workers

President Johnson on Sept. 12, 1966 vetoed a bill increasing life insurance coverage for federal employes. The President said the legislation, estimated to cost $90 million a year, was "inflationary."

The House on May 3, 1965 passed a Johnson Administration bill raising federal contributions to the federal employes' group life insurance program by about $12 million. The Senate passed a substantially more liberal version on March 17, 1966, and the House agreed to the Senate version on Aug. 29, 1966. Similar legislation is expected to be introduced in the 89th Congress.

Civil Service Protections

An Administration-backed proposal sponsored by Rep. Wayne Hays (D-Ohio), was passed by voice vote in the House Sept. 9, 1965. This bill permits transfer of certain foreign affairs jobs and employes from the civil service to the foreign service, thereby subjecting them to "selection out" procedures. However, a "grandfather" clause in the Hays bill gives present civil service employes an option not to transfer and affords those who do transfer a greater amount of job security than is normally applicable to the foreign service.

An amendment by Rep. Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.) to guarantee civil service protections to new employes was defeated 83-65 in the Committee of the Whole before House passage.

The Hays bill was referred to a special subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The subcommittee held hearings and approved the bill Aug. 18, 1966. However, the full committee tabled the bill on September 15 and there was no further action on it in the 89th Congress.

Hatch Act Review

The Hatch Political Activities Act of 1939 and other federal laws limit partisan political activity by most federal workers and by certain state government employes working on federally financed projects. The 89th Congress passed legislation to set up a bipartisan commission to make a study of these federal laws to see if they should be revised or repealed.

Members of the commission are to be appointed by the President, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commission is to make its recommendations to the President and to the Congress within one year. The Senate passed the Hatch Act review bill Aug. 25, 1965 and the House passed the bill Sept. 19, 1966.

Farm Labor

An historic step forward toward more adequate protection for low-paid farm workers was taken during the 89th Congress.

For the first time, certain farm workers were brought under the protections of the Fair Labor Standards Act. (See Fair Labor Standards.) Farm workers will get minimum wage protection if the employer used more than 500 man-days of hired farm labor in any calendar quarter during the preceding calendar year.

Some 390,000 farm workers newly covered under the 1966 FLSA law will get a $1 an hour minimum wage starting Feb. 1, 1967. Their minimum will go to $1.15 on Feb. 1, 1968, and will increase to $1.30 on Feb. 1, 1969.

Foreign Farm Workers—An effort to reduce protections for American farm workers was made Sept. 7, 1965 when the Senate Agriculture Committee included in the omnibus farm bill an amendment transferring from the Secretary of Labor to the Secretary of Agriculture the responsibility to determine when and how many foreign farm workers were needed in the U.S. The AFL-CIO and the Johnson Administration—including the Secretary of Agriculture—strongly opposed this amendment, which was beaten by a 46-45 Senate vote Sept. 13, 1965. The motion to strike the committee farm labor amendment was made by Senator Ross Bass (D-Tenn.). Vice President Hubert Humphrey cast the deciding vote to break a tie.

On a roll call vote Sept. 13, 1965 the Senate voted to keep control over importation of foreign farm workers in the Secretary of Labor.

The Senate Migratory Labor Subcommittee held hearings in 1965 on legislation which would include farm workers under the Labor-Management Relations Act to protect their right to organize and engage in collective bargaining.

In 1965 Congress renewed and improved the Migrant Health Act of 1962. It will be continued for three years with increased funds. A new provision will provide some hospital care for migrants.

REAPPORTIONMENT

One Man—One Vote

One of the major accomplishments of the 89th Congress was protection of the basic democratic principle of "one man—one vtoe."

In 1965 and again in 1966, Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen led conservative campaigns to upset and overturn the Supreme Court's position in support of "one man—one vote." Both efforts were defeated.

In 1962 the Supreme Court decision in the Tennessee case, Baker v. Carr, said the federal courts could hear and rule on state reapportionment cases. On June 23, 1964 the Supreme Court held that both houses of a bicameral state legislature must be apportioned on a population basis only, on "one man—one vote," thus striking directly at malapportioned "rotten borough" rural-dominated state legislatures. A "rotten borough" is an area with disproportionately large representation in the legislature. The AFL-CIO has long urged prompt and democratic apportionment of state legislatures.

Criticism of the Supreme Court decisions grew more intense and a number of "rotten borough" proposals received consideration and action in the 1964 session of the 88th Congress. None was acted upon finally.

In 1965 Dirksen launched a new attack on the "one man—one vote" principle. His proposed constitutional amendment would permit states to apportion one house of the state legislature on other than a population basis. The Senate Constitutional Amendments Subcommittee approved the Dirksen amendment by a 6-3 vote on June 23, 1965. However, Dirksen was not able to get full Senate Judiciary Committee approval for his proposal, and therefore brought it to the Senate floor July 22 as a non-germane amendment to a minor bill.

Liberal senators—backed by a liberal coalition, including the AFL-CIO—mobilized for action in June and July 1965 to stop the Dirksen amendment in committee and later on the Senate floor. To kill the proposed constitutional amendment, one-third plus one of voting senators—a maximum of 34—were needed.

It became clear that the opponents of the Dirksen amendment, led by Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) had enough votes to succeed. Although they were not a majority, more than 34 senators were on record as opposing the amendment. On August 4 the Dirksen proposal came to a vote. The 57-39 vote showed that the liberal coalition had at least five votes more than the necessary 34 to defeat the amendment.

On a roll call vote Aug. 4, 1965, the Dirksen amendment fell short of the two-thirds vote required for constitutional amendments.

A House Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) held hearings on various reapportionment proposals in 1965, but the chairman said that defeat of the Dirksen amendment made these proposals a dead issue.

However, the Senate Judiciary Committee September 9 ordered reported without recommendation another Dirksen proposal by a 9-7 vote. Dirksen had threatened to filibuster against the House-passed immigration bill in committee unless this action was taken.

He then said he would not press for Senate action on his new proposal until the 1966 session.

The revised Dirksen proposal called for state referendums on reapportionment plans which might include apportionment of one house of the state legislature on the basis of geography or political subdivision as well as population. The states would be permitted such referendums after the 10-year census, but only after one house of the legislature had been apportioned on a "one man—one vote" population basis.

The Senate Judiciary Committee reported the revised amendment out on March 2, 1966 and Senate debate began on April 13. Again liberal senators mobilized to oppose the Dirksen amendment. The final vote after a week of debate was almost exactly the same as the 1965 vote.

Before the final vote, the Senate on April 19 accepted by voice vote an amendment by Senator Frank Church (D-Idaho) that both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned on the basis of population before a referendum on a non-population reapportionment plan.

On a roll call vote April 20, 1966 the Dirksen amendment again fell short of the two-thirds required for constitutional amendments.

The 1966 defeat of the Dirksen amendment guarantees that population-based apportionment of state legislatures will prevail and continue. Almost all of the state legislatures are now apportioned, with districts based substantially on the "one man—one vote" principle.

Congressional Districting

Among the 1964 Supreme Court "one man—one vote" rulings was a decision requiring equal representation in congressional districts. To assure equal representation, the court said, the allowable deviation from the average congressional district population should be kept as small as possible.

On March 16, 1965 the House of Representatives passed by voice vote a bill to set standards for congressional districts. The bill allowed a maximum deviation of 15 percent from the state's average congressional district population. It also prohibited at-large districts in states with more than one House seat, attempted to stop gerrymandering by requiring districts to be "contiguous" and "compact" and prohibited redistricting more than once every 10 years.

The Senate Judiciary Committee on Oct. 1, 1965 ordered reported an improved version of the House-passed bill. The Senate committee version permitted deviation of 10 percent above or below the average population for all districts in a state. However, the bill was never actually reported by the Senate committee, and the 1966 session ended without final Senate action.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The Right to Vote

In 1965 the 89th Congress passed strong legislation to protect voting rights of Negroes in the South.

Experience under the 1964 civil rights law and continuing state and local interference with efforts of Negroes to register to vote, particularly in Selma, Ala., showed the need for this legislation. On March 15, 1965 President Johnson asked the Congress to pass strong voting rights protection legislation. Senate debate on the Voting Rights Act of 1965 started on April 22.

On a roll call vote May 25, 1965, the Senate broke the filibuster against the voting rights bill.

Thus, for the second time in two years and for the second time in its history, the Senate voted to cut off an anti-civil rights filibuster.

On a roll call vote May 26, 1965, the Senate passed the voting rights bill.

Earlier, on May 11, the Senate rejected, 49-45, a flat prohibition against any poll tax as a prerequisite for voting in federal, state, or local elections. The AFL-CIO strongly supported this ban on poll taxes. Instead, the Senate bill directed the Attorney General to bring court action against discriminatory use of poll taxes.

On a roll call vote May 11, 1965, the Senate defeated the flat ban on poll taxes.

The House Judiciary Committee voting rights bill reported June 1 contained a flat prohibition against the use of poll taxes as a requirement for voting in any election. The House Rules Committee cleared the committee bill on July 1 for House floor action. The House passed the bill, 333-85, on July 9, after defeating, 248-171, a seriously weakened Republication substitute voting rights bill proposed by Rep. Harold Collier (R-Ill.).

On a roll call vote July 9, 1965 the House endorsed strong voting rights legislation by rejecting the weak Collier substitute.

The final bill approved by the Senate-House conference committee contained most of the strong provisions originally included in the House-passed bill. This final version contained stronger poll tax provisions than the Senate bill, largely because of the strong House position for a flat repeal of the poll tax.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 applies to federal, state, and local elections, including primaries, special and general elections and referendums. It is aimed at stopping arbitrary, discriminatory literacy tests and other discriminatory "voting devices." The law provides for appointment of federal examiners to register would-be voters in states or counties where the law's formula, court action, or the Attorney General certifies the need for such special registration procedures.

In line with the AFL-CIO position that "no American should have to buy his right to vote in any election," the law finds that poll taxes work financial hardship on the poor, have no relation to voting, and can be used to deny the right to vote because of race or color. The law also declares that poll taxes abridge the right to vote and directs the Attorney General to bring court action to stop further use of poll taxes as a precondition for voting. Immediately after the President signed the voting rights law, the Attorney General started the necessary court action.

The Civil Rights Bill of 1966

The conservative anti-labor, anti-civil rights coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats blocked Senate action on the 1966 civil rights bill passed by the House of Representatives. Thus, in 1966, there was no final action by the 89th Congress on civil rights legislation.

Just as in the 1965 and 1966 filibusters against repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, it was Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) who was the major roadblock to Senate consideration and action on the civil rights bill of 1966.

On April 28, 1966 President Johnson sent to the Congress his proposals for civil rights legislation. Major provisions included the prohibition of racial discrimination in selection of federal and state jury members and the prohibition of racial discrimination in the sale and rental of housing. The President's proposals included authorization for the Attorney General to bring suit to prevent intimidation of persons involved in desegregation of schools or other state facilities and federal prohibitions against threats or violence against civil rights workers.

After hearings in May on the Administration's civil rights bill and after considerable discussion and maneuvering in a House Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), the subcommittee on June 16, 1966 approved a civil rights bill without acting on the "fair housing" provisions.

After further discussion and maneuvering in the full Judiciary Committee, a civil rights bill containing a "fair housing" amendment by Rep. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) was approved, 24-9, on June 29, 1966 by the full committee. The Mathias compromise amendment exempted from the "fair housing" requirement individual property owners and owner-occupants of dwellings with fewer than five living units, but prohibits the use of real estate agencies when an owner sought to sell his home on a discriminatory basis.

House consideration of the Judiciary Committee bill started on July 25 and continued for 12 days, with votes on 77 amendments. A key test vote came August 4 on a Mathias "sweetener" amendment to save the bill by allowing a real estate broker to discriminate in sale or rental of a home if he has written instructions from the home-owner and did not solicit the instructions. This Mathias amendment was passed by a narrow 180-179 margin on a teller vote without a roll call. On August 9 the House upheld the teller vote with a 237-176 roll call vote. The Mathias amendment excluded some 60 percent of existing housing, but covered new apartment buildings and new housing developments.

An "anti-riot" amendment sponsored by Rep. William Cramer (R-Fla.) to make it a crime to travel in interstate commerce with intent to incite riot or commit an act of violence was passed by voice vote August 5 and was upheld by a 389-25 roll call vote August 9.

Another important test came on teller vote to strike the "fair housing" section from the bill entirely. It lost, 198-179, with the Republican leadership, led by Rep. Gerald Ford (R-Mich.), seeking to kill the section and Mathias and some 25 Republicans supporting the principle of "fair housing."

On a roll call vote Aug. 9, 1966 the House rejected a motion to knock "fair housing" out of the 1966 civil rights bill.

Voting for "fair housing" 222
(172 Democrats, 50 Republicans)

Voting against "fair housing" 190

The House then went on to pass the civil rights bill, 259-157, the same day. The House-passed bill was placed on the Senate calendar Aug. 12, 1966 without being referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, headed by the Dixiecrat Chairman James Eastland (D-Miss.).

In the Senate, hearings on the Administration civil rights bill had started June 6, in the Judiciary subcommittee headed by another Dixiecrat, Senator Sam Ervin (D-N.C.). The subcommittee never acted on the bill.

On Sept. 7, 1966 the Senate began debate on a motion by Senator Philip Hart (D-Mich.) to make the House-passed civil rights bill the pending business of the Senate. This motion is debatable. The situation was similar to the situation prevailing when filibusters in October 1965 and February 1966 prevented Senate consideration of the House-passed bill to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Senate Republican Leader Dirksen, whose support made possible the civil rights laws of 1964 and 1965, refused to support the 1966 civil rights bill, thus making a filibuster-breaking cloture vote practically impossible, in spite of the support of a majority of the Senate for the civil rights legislation. The focus of Dirksen's opposition was the "fair housing" section of the bill.

After six days of intermittent filibustering, marked by a number of unsuccessful quorum calls, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) filed a cloture motion. The motion received a majority vote but it fell short by 10 votes of the two-thirds vote required to invoke cloture.

On a roll call vote Sept. 14, 1966 the Senate failed to break the filibuster against the 1966 civil rights bill.

Senator Mansfield filed a second cloture motion September 15. Again the motion received a majority vote, but fell short by 10 votes of the required two-thirds.

On a roll call vote Sept. 19, 1966 the Senate failed a second time to break the filibuster against the 1966 civil rights bill.

Voting to break the filibuster 52

This unsuccessful cloture vote ended the Senate fight for action on civil rights legislation in 1966 and killed all hope of further action in the 89th Congress on civil rights.

Senator Eastland issued a statement after the first cloture vote hailing the revival of the anti-labor, anti-civil rights Dixiecrat-Republican coalition. "The civil rights advocates . . . have been completely routed," he said. "The old-time coalition of Southern Democrats and Republicans were united and effective."

President Johnson on September 21 declared that if there were no action on civil rights legislation in 1966 he would announce civil rights proposals in his 1967 State of the Union message. He pointed out that majorities in both the House and the Senate had voted for the 1966 civil rights legislation.

Equal Employment Opportunity

The AFL-CIO strongly supports strong, effective equal employment opportunity "fair employment practices" legislation. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 included an equal employment opportunity program in Title VII with the full support of the AFL-CIO. In the 1965 session of the 89th Congress the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups called for stronger coverage and enforcement provisions in Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 along lines originally proposed by the AFL-CIO.

The AFL-CIO endorsed proposals to broaden the coverage of Title VII to include businesses employing 8 or more persons and unions having 8 or more members, and to strengthen the enforcement of the title by giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to issue cease-and-desist orders enforceable in the federal courts forbidding discrimination in employment.

Legislation embodying these points was reported by the House Education and Labor Committee on Aug. 3, 1965. When the House Rules Committee failed to act on the bill, the House on Sept. 13, 1965 took action to pave the way for House floor action on the bill. Under the 21-day rule, the House voted 259-121 to adopt a rule for floor consideration and action on the bill. Further action on the bill, however, was deferred until the 1966 session of Congress.

On April 27, 1966 the House passed the bill 299-94. There was no Senate action on the bill.

Community Relations Service

The Community Relations Service has responsibility under Title X of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for conciliating disputes involving racial discrimination.

To strengthen and improve procedures for conciliation in disputes involving racial discrimination, President Johnson submitted to the 89th Congress a reorganization plan transferring the Community Relations Service from the Commerce Department to the Justice Department. Such reorganization plans take effect unless one house of the Congress disapproves within 60 days.

Resolutions to block the transfer were defeated in the Senate and in the House in 1966.

The AFL-CIO and civil rights groups supported transfer of CRS to the Justice Department, which has responsibility for administering other civil rights programs. The AFL-CIO declared that the CRS would be made more effective by relating its functions more closely to civil rights enforcement procedures in the Justice Department.

On a roll call vote April 6, 1966 the Senate defeated a resolution to block transfer of the Community Relations Service to the Justice Department.

Immigration Reform

Immigration reform—including an end to the discriminatory national origins quota system—was a major accomplishment of the 89th Congress.

The AFL-CIO supported the basic immigration proposals made by President Johnson on Jan. 13, 1965. At the urging of the AFL-CIO, effective protections for U.S. workers were included in the new law.

The 1965 immigration law sets a three-year phasing-out of the national origins quota system, with unused quotas transferred to a pool for immigrants denied entry because of oversubscribed quotas. The law sets a limit of 170,000 immigrants a year, exclusive of the Western Hemisphere. The law also includes a Western Hemisphere limitation of 120,000 immigrants a year. The law, however, provides for establishment of a Select Commission on Western Hemisphere Immigration to make studies of various aspects of Western Hemisphere immigration, including the impact of immigration and importation of foreign workers from this area on employment, wages, and working conditions in the U.S., and to report to Congress by July 1, 1967 and again by Jan. 15, 1968 on these subjects, including continuation of a Western Hemisphere quota.

Within the 170,000 limit, a 10 percent preference is set for skilled or unskilled workers who could fill a labor need—not temporary or seasonal work—if the Secretary of Labor determines that U.S. workers are not available and that the immigrant will not adversely affect wages and working conditions of workers in the U.S. The Secretary of Labor has the same responsibility for immigrants under the 10 percent preference for members of professions or people with special talents or education, and the same responsibility for immigrants from the Western Hemisphere.

The House passed the immigration bill 318-95 on Aug. 25, 1965. The Senate passed the immigration reform bill 76-18 on Sept. 22, 1965 and the conference report was approved Sept. 30, 1965. The President signed the bill at the base of the Statue of Liberty, New York City, on Oct. 3, 1965.

Home Rule for the District of Columbia

Representative local self-government, "home rule" for the District of Columbia, is a long-standing goal of the AFL-CIO. The 89th Congress failed to complete action on home rule legislation, although both the Senate and the House passed home rule bills that differed considerably from each other.

On July 22, 1965 the Senate passed a home rule bill by a 63-29 vote. The Senate bill provided for an elected mayor, city council, a non-voting delegate to the House of Representatives, and an automatic federal payment based on the value of federal property in the District. This was the sixth home rule bill passed by the Senate.

In the House, where the Dixiecrat-dominated Committee on the District of Columbia has long blocked home rule, a bipartisan group of congressmen filed a discharge petition to bring the Administration's home rule bill directly to the floor without waiting for committee action. With the vigorous support of President Johnson, the AFL-CIO, and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, 218 signatures were secured for the petition. On Sept. 27, 1965 the House voted 213-183 to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Administration's home rule bill.

In spite of various compromise amendments offered by House sponsors of the bill, the House voted 227-174 on Sept. 29, 1965 to accept a substitute proposal of Rep. B. F. Sisk (D-Calif.).

The Sisk substitute provided for (1) a referendum for District voters to decide whether they want home rule, (2) a 15-member nonpartisan, elected Charter Board to prepare a charter, (3) another referendum for District voters to pass on the charter, (4) the approved charter to go into effect automatically within 90 days, (5) unless disapproved by either the Senate or the House.

Reconciliation of the Senate version and the Sisk bill into an acceptable compromise was left over for action in 1966. However, House conferees were never appointed, and a joint Senate-House conference committee never met on D.C. home rule in 1966. Informal meetings between Sisk and the Chairman of the Senate District Committee, Sen. Alan Bible (D-Nev.), proved fruitless.

In an effort to revive the home rule issue during the last days of the 1966 session, Senator Wayne Morse proposed a D.C. home rule bill as an amendment to the higher education bill. Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), joined by 21 other senators, filed a cloture petition Oct. 7, 1966 to forestall an anti-home rule filibuster against the amendment.

By a 41-37 vote on Oct. 10, 1966, the Senate stopped further action on home rule in the 1966 session. The cloture petition received less than the two-thirds votes necessary to cut off a threatened filibuster, although a majority of voting Senators supported the pro-home rule admendment. Faced with a filibuster, Morse withdrew his amendment.

Lie Detectors

The AFL-CIO opposes use of so-called "lie detectors" in public and private employment. Investigations show that the use of such devices is based on deception and myth. Futhermore, use of "lie detectors" violates basic considerations of human dignity, raises issues of invasion of privacy, self-incrimination, and implies the concept of guilty until proven innocent.

In 1965 the AFL-CIO Executive Council called for a broad congressional investigation of use of "lie detectors" and for federal action to ban the use of such devices by private employers and by the federal government. The council called also for anti-"lie detector" campaigns at the state and local level and for union contract provisions to prohibit use of "lie detectors" until such use by private employers is outlawed by federal legislation.

Rep. Cornelius Gallagher (D-N.J.) introduced a bill in 1965 to prohibit, in almost all cases, the purchase or use of "lie detectors" by any federal department or agency. The bill was referred to the House Government Information Subcommittee headed by Rep. John Moss (D-Calif.), who held hearings in August 1965 on Defense Department use of polygraph "lie detectors."

As a result of the Moss hearings, the House Government Operations Committee issued a report March 22, 1966 recommending that the federal government begin research on the validity of polygraph tests and prohibit use of polygraphs except in the most serious national security and criminal cases. In a Sept. 26, 1966 report, the committee praised new Defense Department restrictions on use of polygraphs, but urged more controls. President Johnson set up a federal interagency research committee to study problems involved in use of polygraph "lie detectors."

Public Records

A "freedom of information" bill requiring federal agencies to make public their records and other information was passed in the 1966 session of the 89th Congress. The law authorizes suits in federal courts to force a federal agency to produce information being unlawfully withheld.

The AFL-CIO opposed similar legislation in 1964 because, as drafted and interpreted at that time, it would have opened up investigative and confidential records of the National Labor Relations Board, the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and other agencies to "fishing expeditions" by private parties and would have seriously interfered with the efficient and effective functioning of these labor agencies. The objections of the AFL-CIO and the federal labor agencies were substantially met in the bill finally passed by the Congress and signed by President Johnson on July 4, 1966.

Presidential Campaign Fund

A plan to finance presidential election campaigns with voluntary $1 contributions from taxpayers was adopted by the 89th Congress.

The Senate Finance Committee Oct. 11, 1966 approved this plan, proposed by Chairman Russell Long (D-La.) as an amendment to a House-passed tax bill. An effort to knock out the Long amendment was defeated 33-39 on the Senate floor Oct. 12. The House accepted the bill with the Long campaign fund proposal on Oct. 21. On Oct. 22, 1966, the last day of the 1966 session, the Senate gave final approval to the bill by a 31-22 vote after defeating a motion by Senator Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) to table the Senate-House conference committee report by a 37-15 vote.

Under the Long plan, taxpayers will be able to check off $1 of their tax payment ($2 for joint returns) for a Presidential Election Campaign Fund to pay expenses of the next presidential election. The money will be evenly divided between the two major political parties.

HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE

Medicare-Social Security

The long fight to assure health care for elderly Americans succeeded in the 1965 session of the 89th Congress. Enactment of the 1965 "medicare-social security" legislation was an outstanding accomplishment in American social welfare legislation, reflecting many years of public concern for the nation's health needs.

Rep. Aime Forand (D-R.I.) in 1957 introduced a social insurance health plan for elderly people. Hearings were held but no action taken by the House Ways and Means Committee.

President Kennedy strongly supported legislation introduced in 1961 by Sen. Clinton Anderson (D-N.Mex.) and Rep. Cecil King (D-Calif.) to provide health insurance for the aged. President Johnson likewise gave strong support to health insurance for the aged. The AFL-CIO and its affiliated organizations played a leading role in the long fight to include "medicare" in the nation's social insurance system. In 1964 the Senate passed such a measure but it was turned down in conference by the House conferees.

The omnibus social security bill finally enacted in 1965 contains (1) a basic hospital insurance plan related to social security and railroad retirement, for persons 65 years and older, (2) a supplementary voluntary health plan, (3) expansion of Kerr-Mills medical assistance for needy elderly people, (4) increased funds for child health care and public assistance programs, and (5) an across-the-board increase of 7 percent in social security cash benefits, with a minimum monthly increase of $4.

About 19 million elderly Americans under the basic plan, effective July 1, 1966, are eligible for (1) up to 90 days of hospital care—60 after a $40 deductible and 30 with coinsurance of $10 a day, (2) post-hospital extended care in nursing homes up to 100 days, but after the first 20 days the patient pays $5 a day, (3) outpatient diagnostic services after a $20 deductible and a 20 percent coinsurance payment, and (4) up to 100 post-hospital home health service visits, effective January 1, 1967. The basic plan is financed by a payroll tax which rises from 0.35 percent in 1966 to 0.8 percent in 1987 and thereafter.

The supplementary plan, effective July 1, 1966, will cover physicians' services, home health services, and numerous other medical and health services in and out of medical institutions. The plan will cover 80 percent of these expenses after a $50 deductible. It is financed by a $3 a month payment by the person enrolled and by an additional $3 paid by the federal government.

The omnibus social security legislation raises the taxable wage base from $4,800 to $6,600 effective Jan. 1, 1966. It includes tips as taxable wages for tipped workers. It also contains many other changes which liberalize and broaden social security protections, including benefits for widows at age 60 and payment of child benefits to those attending school up to age 22. Extensive changes in welfare and public assistance programs greatly increase opportunities to assure adequate medical care for children in low income families.

The House Ways and Means Committee started hearings on health care legislation in January 1965 and reported the omnibus social security bill on Mar. 24. The bill was passed in the House Apr. 8 by a 313-115 vote after defeat of a recommittal motion by Rep. John Byrnes (R-Wis.) to strike out the basic hospital insurance plan.

On a roll call vote April 8, 1965 the House rejected a motion to kill the basic hospital social insurance plan to protect elderly Americans.

The Senate Finance Committee held hearings in June, added many amendments, and reported the omnibus bill June 24. The Senate passed the bill 68-21 on July 9, 1965 after defeating a motion by Sen. Carl Curtis (R-Neb.) to kill the basic hospital insurance plan and the supplementary health plan.

On a roll call vote July 9, 1965 the Senate defeated an effort to kill the programs of health insurance for elderly Americans.

The House approved the conference committee report 307-116 on July 27. The Senate approved the report 70-24 on July 28. President Johnson signed the omnibus medicare-social security bill into law July 30, 1965 in Independence, Mo., in the presence of former President Truman in recognition of Mr. Truman's fight for health insurance.

On April 6, 1966 the Senate and the House, by voice votes, approved a two-month extension—to May 31, 1966—of the deadline for elderly people to sign up for the supplementary health insurance plan. President Johnson had requested this extension.

Expansion of Eligibility—The 1966 tax withholding law provides benefits of $35 a month, effective Oct. 1, 1966, for all persons 72 years or older who were not previously eligible for social security benefits, with an additional $17.50 a month for a spouse, when both husband and wife were entitled to benefits. The amount of these benefits would be reduced by the amount of pensions received under other governmental pension or welfare systems. The new eligibility will be cut off Jan. 1, 1968.

This provision, accepted by Senate-House conferees, was based on an amendment proposed by Senator Winston Prouty (R-Vt.) during Senate consideration of the tax withholding bill. The Prouty amendment was approved 45-40 on March 8, 1966.

Railroad Retirement

In 1966 the 89th Congress approved a supplemental pension program entirely paid for by railroad employers. This program, administered by the Railroad Retirement Board, is a significant breakthrough toward more adequate retirement income without cost to railroad workers.

The supplemental pension starts at $45 a month for railroad workers aged 65 or over and retiring on or after July 1, 1966 with a current employment connection and 25 years of service. The supplemental pension rises $5 a year to $70 for such retirees with 30 years of service.

The 1966 bill, sponsored by Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) and Rep. Torbert Macdonald (D-Mass.), also raises basic railroad retirement pensions by 7 percent for railroad retirees who did not get the 7 percent increase in 1965 and who do not get the supplemental pension under the 1966 law.

In 1965 the 89th Congress enacted legislation sponsored by Rep. Oren Harris (D-Ark.) and also by Senator Pell. This law (1) enlarged the role of the Railroad Retirement Board in administering "medicare" for elderly railroaders; (2) eliminated a previous restriction on "dual benefits" for wives of retired railroades; (3) increased benefits for many railroad retirees, especially in the lower brackets; and (4) provided an equitable adjustment of the taxable base to finance the added benefits.

Survivor Benefits—Another railroad retirement law approved by the 89th Congress in 1966 raises the age for children's survivor benefits from 18 to 21 years inclusive. This law, sponsored by Senator Pell and Rep. Harley Staggers (D-W. Va.), gives the same protections to railroad workers' families that are available to families of workers under Social Security.

Health Legislation

To make available more and better health care to the American people, and to upgrade the quality of health care, the 89th Congress passed a wide range of important health legislation in addition to the health insurance programs established by the 1965 Social Security law.

Health Manpower—The Allied Health Professions Personnel Training Act of 1966 authorizes $105 million over a three-year period to expand and improve training capacity for medical technologists, dental hygienists, physical therapists, occupational therapists, X-ray technologists, and many other categories of medical technicians and assistants.

The law also strengthens and improves existing loan programs for students of medicine, osteopathy, dentistry, podiatry, pharmacy, optometry, and nursing. It includes loan "forgiveness" of 15 percent a year, up to 100 percent, for doctors, dentists, and optometrists who practice in poor, rural areas. Under existing law, practice in "shortage areas" can result in loan "forgiveness" of 10 percent a year, up to a 50 percent maximum.

The House passed the allied health professions bill 364-0 June 23, 1966. The Senate passed it by voice vote Oct. 14, and the House accepted the Senate version Oct. 17, 1966.

Health Services—To strengthen and improve public health services in states and local areas, the 89th Congress passed the Comprehensive Health Planning and Public Health Services Act of 1966.

The law sets up a new system of broad grants for comprehensive public health services with $140 million authorized for fiscal 1968. The new system will take the place of previous specific grant programs for such specific health problems as cancer, mental health, tuberculosis, and heart disease.

The law authorized $9 million for comprehensive public health planning in fiscal 1967 and $15 million for fiscal 1968. It also authorized $5 million in fiscal 1968 to help nonprofit public health schools do consulting and administrative work and special training for state and local public health programs.

Regional Medical Programs—In his Jan. 7, 1965 message to Congress on health problems and needs, President Johnson called for a five-year program to develop multi-purpose regional health centers to spread the results of the latest research findings on heart disease, cancer, stroke, and other diseases.

The 89th Congress approved legislation authorizing a $340 million three-year program of federal grants to help set up regional medical programs. The final version of this legislation reflected changes made to meet objections of the American Medical Association. Thus, the final bill emphasized local cooperative arrangements using existing medical schools, hospitals, and research institutions and spelled out various protections for doctors as requested by the AMA.

Also in 1965 the Congress extended for three years an existing program of federal grants for construction of health research facilities and authorized an additional $280 million for this purpose.

Health Professions—To increase the number of doctors and other health professional personnel, the 89th Congress in the Health Professions Educational Assistance Amendments of 1965 set up a new, four-year program of scholarships for needy students from low income families to study medicine, dentistry, osteopathy, and optometry. Scholarships could range up to $2,500 a year.

The same 1965 law authorized a new $200 million, four-year program of federal grants to improve the quality to teaching at schools of medicine, dentistry, and other health professions. It expands existing construction aid programs to increase student capacity of medical teaching facilities and expands the existing medical student loan program.

Mental Health Staffing—A new seven-year program of federal grants to help pay starting costs of staffing community mental health centers got congressional approval in 1965. The staffing aid law also extended and expanded programs to help train teachers of mentally retarded and other handicapped children. The bill contained additional aid for projects to improve educational opportunities for handicapped children.

In 1963 the AFL-CIO urged that the new program to help build community mental health centers include staffing provisions but the American Medical Association was successful in getting a $427 million staffing authorization knocked out of the bill. However, in 1965 the AMA was defeated on this issue when the House approved staffing aid 389-0 on May 4 and the Senate approved staffing aid by voice vote on June 28. The seven-year cost of the staffing aid program was estimated at $224 million.

Medical Libraries—In 1965 Congress passed $105 million five-year program for federal aid for construction of medical library facilities, for training, research, and development in medical library science, and for acquisition of books and equipment by medical libraries.

Health Programs Extended—In 1965 Congress extended the mass immunization program with $11 million a year authorized for three years; extended for three years the migrant workers health program; raised authorized grants for public health schools by $5 million a year; and extended for one year the grant programs for general and community health services.

Aid to Elementary and Secondary Schools

An historic breakthrough in federal aid for education was approved by the 89th Congress. The long controversy over federal aid for private schools as well as public schools was finally set aside by passage of school aid legislation in 1965. In 1966 the Congress widened and enlarged the scope of this legislation.

The Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 gave major emphasis to helping schools with children from low-income families. It authorized federal grants to school districts in about 95 percent of the nation's counties. For fiscal 1966, the Congress authorized more than $1 billion.

The 1966 Elementary and Secondary Education Act Amendments raised authorized school aid to an estimated $2.4 billion in fiscal 1967 and $3.7 billion in fiscal 1968.

The biggest and most important part of the 1965 school aid bill, Title I authorized federal aid to the states for school districts with children from families on relief or with yearly incomes of less than $2,000. The 1966 legislation raises the low-income factor to $3,000, effective for fiscal 1968, and allocates funds on the basis of the number of children from low-income or relief families times 50 percent of each state's average expenditure per school child or 50 percent of the national average per pupil expenditure, whichever is higher. The funds can be used in any way decided by local education authorities subject to approval by state and federal education agencies.

The 1965 school aid law also set up a five-year program of grants to the states to buy textbooks and library books for use in public and private non-profit elementary and secondary schools. For this purpose, $100 million was authorized in the first year, $125 million for fiscal 1967 and $150 million for fiscal 1968.

Another part of the bill was a five-year program of grants for supplementary community-wide education centers to expand local elementary and secondary education opportunities, to help "drop-outs" go back to school, to provide guidance and counseling, and for other community-wide education purposes. This program started with $100 million authorized the first year, $175 million for fiscal 1967 and $500 million for fiscal 1968.

On a roll call vote March 26, 1965 the House approved the basic elementary-secondary school aid bill.

Voting for aid to schools 263
(228 Democrats, 35 Republicans)

Voting against aid to schools 153
(57 Democrats, 96 Republicans)

The elementary-secondary school aid legislation was approved by the Senate 73-18 April 9, 1966 after the Senate rejected a number of crippling amendments, including a proposal by Sen. Peter Dominick (R-Colo.) to knock out the strong Title I formula for allocation of funds.

On a roll call vote April 8, 1965 the Senate voted to keep the low-income family formula for school aid.

Voting to keep the school aid formula 53

Voting to weaken the school aid formula 38
(16 Democrats, 22 Republicans)

President Johnson signed the historic school aid bill April 11, 1965.

In the 1966 legislation, the 89th Congress increased school aid authorizations beyond the President's requests. The 1966 bill set up a new program of aid to handicapped children, liberalized requirements for federally impacted school districts to receive aid, and made other various changes.

Two changes reflected reactions to civil rights pressures. One prohibits federal requirements for assignment or transportation of students or teachers to overcome racial imbalance. The second was an attempt to prohibit the deferral of funds by the Office of Education until following hearings, there was an "express finding on record" of non-compliance with the requirements of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The House took three votes—103-60, 113-63, and 220-116—supporting an amendment by Rep. L. H. Fountain (D-N.C.) that would have outlawed the deferral of those school district funds. The "anti-busing" amendment passed by a 263-5 vote, and final passage of the 1966 school aid bill then carried by a 237-97 vote on Oct. 6. This action simply reaffirmed a provision of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The Senate passed its version of the school aid bill on the same day after adopting, by voice vote, an amendment by Senator Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) prohibiting special consideration by the Commissioner of Education for projects dealing with "racial imbalance."

During the meetings of the Senate-House conference committee, the Fountain amendment was changed to permit the deferral of funds until hearing is held and a decision rendered. The conferees set a 90-day limit for this procedure. This final version of the Fountain amendment strengthened Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The conference committee report was approved by a Senate voice vote Oct. 19 and by a 185-76 House vote on Oct. 20, 1966.

Higher Education

A second major education breakthrough achieved by the 89th Congress, the Higher Education Act of 1965, authorized a college scholarship program and increased support for construction of college facilities. This legislation was further strengthened and improved in the 1966 session.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the basic purpose of the new legislation, which will make it easier for children of low and middle income families to get a college education.

Most of the programs in the new higher education legislation had been recommended by President Johnson in his Jan. 12, 1965 education message to Congress. These programs attack the high cost of higher education and the resulting financial barriers to educational opportunity through a combination of federal scholarships, guaranteed loans, a broadened work-study program, and vastly increased financial support for construction of graduate and undergraduate college facilities.

The 1965 bill authorized $804 million for a wide variety of higher education programs. The 1966 bill authorized $3.4 billion over a three-year period for college construction grants and loans.

The new scholarship program was a "first" in the history of the Congress—the first federal scholarships for general undergraduate education. An estimated 140,000 new students will get scholarships each year for three years under the $70 million-a-year authorization. Continuation of a student's scholarship over a four-year period also was authorized without a specific limit on funds.

The guaranteed loan program, providing an estimated $42 million in interest subsidies, makes it possible for students to obtain private, federally-guaranteed, low-interest loans. Students from families with adjusted incomes of $15,000 or less a year will have the interest on their loans paid by the government while they continue their education. After completion of their education, students will pay only 3 percent interest. Students from higher income families will receive no interest subsidies, but will be eligible for the other provisions of the loan program.

The work-study program authorized in the 1964 Economic Opportunity Act was transferred to the U. S. Office of Education and vastly broadened through the elimination of the poverty requirement for eligibility. The law authorized for the work-study program $129 million for fiscal 1966, $165 million for fiscal 1967, and $200 million for fiscal 1968.

Other parts of the higher education legislation provide:

- Increased authorizations under the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963 for construction of undergraduate academic facilities to $460 million in fiscal 1966, to $475 million in fiscal 1967, to $728 million in fiscal 1968, and to $936 million in fiscal 1969; also, for construction of graduate and undergraduate facilities, $260 million in fiscal 1967, $520 million in fiscal 1968, and $520 million in fiscal 1969.

- Aid to "community service programs" of colleges and universities to expand federal extension and adult education activities, with emphasis on urban problems.
- Improved college library resources through matching grants and supplemental non-matching grants.
- Aid to "developing institutions"—including two-year technical colleges—that require financial assistance to survive.
- Establishment of a National Teachers Corps to raise the quality of teaching in poor, slum areas.
- Authorization of two-year fellowships for persons teaching, or planning to teach, in elementary and secondary schools.
- Improvement in college classroom instruction through matching grants for laboratory and other equipment.

The House passed the 1965 higher education bill 367-22 on Aug. 26, 1965. The Senate passed a higher education bill with major amendments and additions on Sept. 2, 1965. The House approved the conference committee compromise bill 313-63 on Oct. 20, 1965 after rejecting 226-152 a Republican recommittal motion to knock out the National Teacher Corps program. The Senate accepted the conference report on higher education Oct. 20, 1965 by voice vote.

In the 1966 session, the House passed higher education legislation without opposition by voice vote on May 2, 1966. The Senate passed a similar but more general college construction assistance bill by voice vote on Oct. 10, 1966. The vote followed Senate rejection of cloture on an unrelated amendment by Senator Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) to allow "home rule" self-government in the District of Columbia.

The final 1966 higher education bill was approved Oct. 21, 1966 by a 223-13 House vote and by a Senate voice vote.

It authorized $3.6 billion over a three-year period for grants and loans to help build college facilities, to help small, poor, "developing" colleges, and to enlarge existing student loan programs. One provision of the bill added "industrial arts" to the list of critical subjects for which the National Defense Education Art provides funds to help improve instruction.

Library Services and Construction

The 89th Congress continued the Library Services and Construction Act of 1964 with a total of $700 million authorized for a four-year period.

The 1966 library bill will help public libraries buy books and equipment and will help pay for new construction and repairs. It contains new programs of support for interlibrary cooperation, specialized services to state institutions, and aid for handicapped.

The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, in its report on the bill, expressed concern about rising book prices, and asked further study of this problem by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The House passed the library bill 336-2 June 2. The Senate passed a similar bill June 22, and the House agreed to the Senate version June 28, 1966.

Vocational School Loans

To help post-high school students at trade, technical, and vocational schools, the 89th Congress passed the National Vocational Loan Insurance act.

The bill, passed June 21, 1965, by the House and Sept. 28, 1965, by the Senate, authorizes up to $75 million a year in loan insurance and interest subsidy payments to students from low and middle income families. The bill allows insured loans up to $1,000 a year with a limit on the unpaid principal of $2,000 per student.

Vocational Rehabilitation

A major overhaul and expansion of the federal-state vocational rehabilitation program was enacted by the 89th Congress. The 1965 amendments are expected to raise the number of disabled people rehabilitated for jobs from 135,000 to 200,000 a year.

The 1965 legislation continues and expands existing programs, increasing the federal share in the basic federal-state vocational rehabilitation program from a 50-70 percent range to 75 percent for all states by fiscal 1967. It authorizes for allocation to the states $300 million in fiscal 1966, $350 million in fiscal 1967, and $400 million in fiscal 1968.

Cold War G.I. Bill

Veterans' readjustment benefits similar to those provided for veterans of World War II and the Korean War are provided in the "Cold War G.I. Bill," approved by the 89th Congress. Enactment of this legislation, long sought by the AFL-CIO, was a major achievement of the 89th Congress.

The new law offers a tremendous opportunity to young veterans to advance their education and training for jobs, and it authorizes home loans and home loan guarantees for veterans. Full-time student veterans will get $100 a month in education benefits, $125 if he has one dependent, and $150 if he has two or more dependents. Part-time students will get scaled-down benefits. The law does not include apprenticeship courses or on-the-job training. Legislation to remedy this defect is expected in 1967.

The Senate passed the "Cold War G.I. Bill" sponsored by Senator Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) by a 69-17 vote on July 19, 1965. The House passed similar legislation 381-0 on Feb. 7, 1966 and the Senate accepted the House version 99-0 on Feb. 10.

Veterans' Disability Benefits

For veterans with service-connected disabilities and their dependents, Congress in 1965 raised monthly benefits by an average 10 percent, with the biggest increases going to veterans who are 50 percent or more disabled.

Federal Employees' Compensation for Injury

Significant improvements in the Federal Employees' Compensation Act were approved by the 89th Congress in 1966. This law is particularly important because many states use it as a model for workmen's compensation legislation.

The most significant feature of the 1966 legislation was the provision which tied benefit increases to cost-of-living changes reflected in the Consumer Price Index.

The 1966 law also raised the limit on disability and survivor benefits for disabled federal workers and their families. Benefits payable for dependent children or orphans are continued until the child finishes full-time education or reaches age 23, whichever is sooner.

The House passed this legislation March 7. The Senate passed a similar bill June 16, and the House agreed to the Senate version June 21, 1966.

Mine Safety

The 89th Congress enacted legislation to assure safe and healthy working conditions for workers in metal and non-metallic mining. In the past, only coal mining operations were subject to health and safety regulation.

The House passed a metal and non-metallic mine safety bill, sponsored by Rep. James O'Hara (D-Mich.) by voice vote Sept. 2, 1965. The Senate passed an amended version 57-18 on June 23, 1966. In conference, a generally satisfactory bill was agreed to, and the conference committee report was approved Aug. 31, 1966 by voice votes in the House and Senate. President Johnson signed the bill into law on September 16, 1966.

The metal and non-metallic mine safety bill, as finally approved gives the Bureau of Mines authority to prescribe health and safety rules and to enforce them through a system of mine inspections. The bureau may approve safety programs set up by states and cooperate with states in mine inspection and safety enforcement.

Auto Safety-Highway Safety

Two major safety laws aimed at cutting down automobile deaths on the nation's highways were approved by the 89th Congress.

An auto safety bill, approved in 1966, calls for federal motor vehicle safety standards to be set by the Secretary of Commerce for automobiles, trucks, and buses. Preliminary standards take effect January 31, 1967 and revised standards take effect January 31, 1968.

The auto safety bill authorizes federal tire standards with grading and labeling requirements. It also authorizes a national driver register service listing the names of drivers whose permits have been suspended or revoked.

The Congress also approved a three-year $322 million highway safety bill to reduce traffic accidents. The traffic safety grant program requires states to set up a federally approved highway safety program by December 31, 1968 or lose 10 percent of the state's federal aid highway funds.

The Senate passed the auto safety bill 76-0 June 24, 1966. The House passed a similar bill 371-0 August 17, 1966. The Senate-House conference report was approved August 31, 1966.

The Senate passed the highway safety bill by voice vote June 24, 1966. The House passed a similar bill 317-3 August 18, 1966. The conference report was approved August 31, 1966 by the House and September 1, 1966 by the Senate.

Truth in Packaging

A long, hard-fought battle between consumer groups and business interests in the 89th Congress finally produced a modest step forward toward better protection for consumers.

To stop deceptive, misleading packaging which boosts family shopping budgets, the AFL-CIO has long contended that strong "truth in packaging" legislation is necessary.

The 1966 law, weakened from earlier legislative proposals favored by pro-consumer groups, capped a five-year campaign. The law provides:

- Manufacturers must label accurately and prominently the contents and net quantity in ounces of a package.
- Amounts contained in servings must be labeled.
- Definitions can be established for such size terms as "small," "medium" and "large."
- Misleading measures like "jumbo quart" or "big ounce" are forbidden.
- Unnecessary "slack fill" is forbidden.
- "Cents-off" and "economy" claims can be regulated.
- The Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare (using the Food and Drug Administration) and the Federal Trade Commission have authority to issue regulations to carry out the law.
- The Secretary of Commerce is to encourage voluntary action by manufacturers to standardize package weights and quantities on a product line basis.
- If the voluntary approach doesn't work, the Secretary of Commerce must report the situation to Congress together with his recommendations as to whether Congress should enact new legislation to deal with the problem.

The Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Anti-trust and Monopoly held hearings on deceptive packaging in 1961, 1962, and 1963. The subcommittee's 1964 report called for passage of a "truth in packaging" bill sponsored by Senate Philip Hart (D-Mich.). In 1965 Senator Hart revised his bill to take the bill out of the jurisdiction of the conservative Judiciary Committee. The Senate Commerce Committee held hearings on the Hart bill in 1965 but took no further action that year.

In 1966 President Johnson's consumer message to Congress repeated his earlier requests for congressional action on "truth in packaging." The Senate Commerce Committee reported an amended version of the Hart bill May 25 and the Senate passed it, with minor changes, by 72-9 on June 9. The Senate bill allowed the federal government to set standards for weights and quantities in packages.

The House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee—after considerable intra-committee filibustering and maneuvering, and under tremendous pressure from business groups opposed to "truth in packaging"—unanimously approved a watered-down bill on Sept. 22. The bill, no longer controversial, was brought up on the House floor under suspension of the rules, a procedure that requires at least a two-thirds vote. The House passed the bill 300-8 on Oct. 3. This bill left weight and quantity standardization to voluntary action by manufacturers.

Industry pressures continued, and, with the adjournment of the 89th Congress approaching, Senate leaders decided to take the House version. The House approved the conference report 242-6 on Oct. 17 and the Senate agreed by voice vote Oct. 19, 1966.

Electric Power Rates

Legislation sponsored in 1965 by Sen. Spessard Holland (D-Fla.) and Sen. George Smathers (D-Fla.) would have sharply raised electric power costs to consumers. The AFL-CIO and consumer groups strongly opposed this proposal. The Holland-Smathers bill would have seriously restricted Federal Power Commission authority over wholesale electric power rates, turning over much FPC authority to state regulatory bodies. This would have opened up opportunities for rate-gouging of consumers by private power companies.

On July 1, 1965 the Senate Commerce Committee refused 10-9 to report the Holland-Smathers bill out for Senate floor action, but similar legislation in the House was approved by a subcommittee for 1966 action by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

However, the bill was never brought up before the full House committee, and there was no further action in the 89th Congress.

Arts and Humanities

To encourage and support their growth and development, the 89th Congress set up a National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities to provide federal aid for the visual and performing arts and for the humanities. Grants would go to groups and individuals working in the arts and humanities.

The bill, which authorizes $63 million over a three-year period for these purposes, was passed by voice vote in the Senate on June 10, 1965 and by voice vote in the House on Sept. 15, 1965.

The AFL-CIO supports this legislation, which protects and enhances wages, working conditions, and job opportunities of professional union artists, craftsmen, and technicians.

EMPLOYMENT AND THE ECONOMY

Investment Tax Credit

To curb the inflationary business investment boom in 1966. The 89th Congress suspended for 15 months the 7 percent investment tax credit on business buying of machinery and equipment. The Congress also suspended certain methods of accelerated depreciation of industrial and commercial buildings.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported President Johnson's Sept. 8, 1966 anti-inflation proposal to suspend the investment tax credit and accelerated tax write-off provisions. The one-sector capital goods boom was creating localized inflationary pressures in a few industries and in a few areas. The AFL-CIO also pointed out that the unbalanced, excessive, capital goods investment boom was raising the economy's productive capacity faster than the overall increase in the demand for goods and services.

In addition to lowering the buying power of workers' take-home pay, profit inflation has contributed to federal high-interest, tight-money policies causing cut-backs in residential construction and in state and local goverment borrowing for construction of needed public facilities, the AFL-CIO declared.

Unfortunately, the Congress weakened the effectiveness of the President's original proposals. The 1966 law suspends the 7 percent investment tax credit and the accelerated depreciation provisions only from Oct. 10, 1966 through Dec. 31, 1967. The tax credit suspension does not apply to investment of less than $20,000 and it does not apply to investment in facilities for air and water pollution control. The accelerated depreciation suspension does not apply to buildings valued at $50,000 or less. Moreover, a "sweetener" provision broadens the investment tax credit when it is reinstated Jan. 1, 1968.

The House passed the investment tax credit suspension bill 221-118 on Sept. 30 and the Senate passed similar legistration 38-19 on Oct. 14. The Senate-House conference committee report was approved by a 161-76 vote in the House Oct. 20, and by a Senate voice vote Oct. 21, 1966.

Excise Taxes, Tax Withholding

In 1965 the AFL-CIO had urged a first-step excise tax cut of about $2 billion in excise taxes that hit low and middle income families hardest and urged that the full savings from these tax cuts be passed on to consumers through lower retail prices.

The AFL-CIO also asked an end to income taxes on families with income under $3,000 and individuals with income under $1,500 a year and urged a higher minimum standard deduction to help low income taxpayers. These proposals were not included in the 1965 tax cut bill passed by Congress.

The 1965 excise tax cut approved by the 89th Congress was to take effect in five stages. It was aimed at cutting excise taxes by $4.7 billion by 1969.

The House passed the excise tax cut bill 401-6 on June 2, 1965 and the Senate passed the bill 84-3 on June 15, 1965. As recommended by the AFL-CIO, the President directed the Council of Economic Advisors to report whether the excise tax cuts were passed on to consumers.

In 1966 the 89th Congress passed tax legislation designed primarily to provide more federal revenue to pay for the war in Viet Nam.

The 1966 tax bill, expected to raise $4.8 billion in fiscal 1967, sets up a graduated system of federal income tax withholding without changing existing income tax rates, speeds up corporation tax payments into the calendar year the corporation income was earned, stopped scheduled cuts in automobile and telephone excise taxes and postponed further scheduled cuts in these taxes until April 1, 1968, and sets new prohibitions against income tax deductions for the cost of advertisements in political publications and for the cost of tickets to political dinners or political programs.

The House passed the 1966 tax increase bill 246-146 on Feb. 23 and the Senate passed the bill 79-9 on March 9. The final bill included a payment of $35 a month for persons 72 years and older who were not eligible for social security benefits. (See Medicare-Social Security, Expansion of Eligibility.)

Area and Regional Development

Aid for the Appalachia region and a regional public works-development program were two important programs adopted in 1965. Both will accelerate the federal effort to increase job opportunities in chronically depressed sections of the country.

The bill to alleviate poverty in the Appalachia region was the first major bill to clear the 89th Congress. It authorizes the expenditure of $1.1 billion in federal funds over the next six years to help the entire 11-state Appalachia region.

The aims of the Appalachia program include ending the isolation of the region through a vast program of highway construction, building health facilities and vocational schools, land improvement, the reclamation of mining areas and the development of timber and water resources. The bill also establishes an Appalachian Regional Commission—representing the federal government and all of the states involved—to prepare an economic redevelopment plan for the 360-county area, and to coordinate the projects authorized by the bill.

On a roll call vote February 1, 1965 the Senate passed the Appalachia aid bill.

The Senate-passed bill was approved by the House without amendment after a 323-100 defeat of a Republican effort to cut back funds for the Appalachia program.

On a roll call vote March 3, 1965, the House passed the Appalachia aid bill.

The Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965—the successor to the 1961 Area Redevelopment Act—insures continuing aid for distressed urban and rural areas and Indian reservations in all parts of the country. The bill authorizes more than $3 billion over a five-year period for industrial and commercial loans, public facility loans and grants, technical assistance and for other purposes.

The regional public works-development program makes possible establishment of development districts through which economic planning can proceed on a multi-county basis wherever feasible. The bill also provides for "regional action planning commissions" for multi-state regional redevelopment efforts—comparable to the Appalachia program—when such joint action is needed.

The Senate passed the area public works-development bill 71-22 on June 1, 1965 after defeating an amendment by Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.) to cut the yearly authorization for public works and development facilities grants from $400 million to $325 million.

On a roll call vote June 1, 1965 the Senate rejected the Republican effort to weaken the area public works-development aid bill.

The House passed the area aid bill 246-138 on Aug. 12, 1965 after rejecting a motion by Rep. Cramer (R-Fla.) to weaken the bill by striking out federal loans and guarantees for purchase or development of land and facilities.

On a roll call vote August 12, 1965 the House defeated the Republican effort to weaken the area public works-development bill.

An amendment offered by Rep. B. F. Sisk (D-Calif.) to increase the number of areas eligible for aid was accepted by a 196-194 vote before final passage.

On a roll call vote August 12, 1965 the House voted final passage of the area public works-development bill.

War on Poverty

The 89th Congress continued the "war on poverty" program started in 1964, but made some changes in the controversial anti-poverty program in 1965 and again in 1966.

In 1965 the Congress authorized $1.7 billion and appropriated $1.5 billion for anti-poverty action in fiscal 1966. It also made numerous liberalizing changes in the program. The existing state governors' veto power, a "states' rights" provision in the original 1964 legislation, was continued, but the 1965 anti-poverty bill authorized the director of the Office of Economic Opportunity to override a veto.

In 1965 Rep. Albert Quie (R-Minn.) proposed a motion to slash anti-poverty funds and to keep state governors' absolute veto power over certain anti-poverty programs in their states.

On a roll call vote July 22, 1965 the House rejected the Republican motion to weaken the anti-poverty program.

After defeat of the Republican weakening recommit motion, which would have cut fiscal 1966 funds from $1.7 billion to $947 million the House passed the 1965 anti-poverty bill by a 245-158 vote.

In the Senate, the "states' rights" fight continued. A key vote came on an amendment by Sen. Paul Fannin (R-Ariz.) to strike out authority for the OEO director to overrule a state governor's veto.

On a roll call vote August 17, 1965 the Senate, by a tie vote, rejected the Fannin "states' rights" amendment to the anti-poverty bill.

(43 Democrats, 2 Republicans)

Voting to weaken anti-poverty plans with veto power for state governors 45

The Senate voted approval 61-29 for the 1965 anti-poverty bill, including the provision to repeal the governors' veto power over community action and other anti-poverty programs.

However, a Dixiecrat-Republican alliance in the House forced acceptance of the House-pased bill's veto provisions. On Sept. 15, by a 209-180 vote, the House approved a recommittal motion by Rep. William Ayres (R-Ohio). The Ayres motion gave House conferees instructions to insist on keeping the existing state governors' veto over certain anti-poverty programs. Senate-House conferees then accepted the House version of the veto provision, which continues the veto power but allows the OEO director to override a state governor's veto.

In 1966 the Congress authorized $1.75 billion and appropriated $1.5 billion for anti-poverty activities in fiscal 1967. For the first time, the Congress earmarked funds for various programs like the Neighborhood Youth Corps, the Job Corps, and Operation Head Start.

Other provisions of the 1966 bill would start neighborhood health centers, cut off anti-poverty funds or services to anyone convicted of being involved in a riot, and require at least one-third of members of local community action boards be elected by poor people.

The House passed the 1966 anti-poverty legislation by a 210-156 vote on Sept. 29. The Senate passed a different version by a 49-20 vote on Oct. 4. The final compromise version was passed by voice vote in the Senate Oct. 18 and by a 170-109 House vote Oct. 20, 1966. Appropriations legislation including $1.5 billion for the fiscal 1967 anti-poverty program was then approved shortly before the end of the 1966 session on Oct. 22, 1966.

Unemployment Compensation

The 89th Congress failed to complete action on legislation to improve the nation's unemployment compensation system, as the House and the Senate passed widely differing UC bills.

Business groups worked actively and successfully to prevent enactment of effective legislation to establish minimum federal unemployment insurance standards supported by the AFL-CIO.

At present, unemployment insurance is compensating only one out of every five dollars workers lose through joblessness. In most states, unemployment insurance programs are inadequate, unfair, and discriminatory. Half the unemployed receive no benefits either because they work in uncovered jobs, or because their benefits have been cut off, or because they have been denied benefits under arbitrary rules and penalties. Some state programs provide no more than a token pittance to jobless workers, and many state laws are written as if benefits were gifts by the employer conditioned on workers' good behavior.

In 1965 the House Ways and Means Committee held hearings on unemployment compensation proposals by President Johnson which were sponsored by Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.). Senator Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.) sponsored a companion bill in the Senate.

The AFL-CIO supported the McCarthy-Mills legislation which provided (1) minimum federal benefit standards for state unemployment benefit programs, (2) federal unemployment benefits to long-term jobless workers who exhaust eligibility for benefits under state plans, (3) extension of coverage to about 5 million additional workers, and (4) federal grants to states to cover two-thirds of unusually high payments of benefits in any year.

The House Ways and Means Committee reported a "completely unsatisfactory" UC bill on June 17, 1966. The committee bill failed to include federal standards, although it did extend coverage to about 3.5 million additional workers. The watered-down committee bill was passed by a 374-10 vote in the House on June 22.

The Senate Finance Committee Aug. 2 reported a UC bill containing federal standards but with very limited expansion of coverage. The Senate passed the UC bill on a 53-31 vote Aug. 8 after rejecting an effort to knock out federal standards. The key vote came on an amendment by Senator McCarthy to restore committee language providing that state maximum UC benefit amounts must be at least 50 percent of the jobless worker's previously weekly wage up to a maximum of 50 percent of the state's average weekly wage.

On a roll call vote Aug. 8, 1966 the Senate voted for federal standards for unemployment compensation benefits for jobless workers.

Voting for basic federal UC standards 45
(38 Democrats, 7 Republicans)

Voting against federal UC standards 36
(16 Democrats, 20 Republicans)

Although the Senate asked Aug. 8 for a Senate-House conference committee to produce a compromise UC bill, the House did not agree to go to conference on the UC legislation until Oct. 12, as the end of the 1966 session was approaching. Anti-UC-reform lobbying by business groups increased in intensity in the final weeks of the session. When the conference committee refused to accept federal standards, the AFL-CIO urged that the pending UC legislation be scuttled. Thus, the 89th Congress ended without final action on unemployment compensation reform legislation.

Manpower Development

The Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 is aimed at training and retraining workers for available jobs. It set a new pattern of aid to jobless workers displaced by automation and technological change, to workers seeking to upgrade their skills and to unskilled, inadequately educated teenagers and older workers.

The 89th Congress took action to extend and expand the MDTA program in 1965 and again in 1966. These improvements aroused little controversy.

In 1965, the Congress continued the MDTA program for three years, with $454 million authorized for fiscal 1966.

The 1965 MDTA amendments continued 100 percent federal financing of training programs for an additional year, through June 30, 1966. Since then states have to pay 10 percent of training costs, except training allowances, which continue to be fully financed by the federal government.

The 1965 MDTA legislation also raised the maximum individual training period from one to two years with additional training allowances and benefits and brought Area Redevelopment Administration training programs under MDTA.

The 1965 MDTA was passed by a 76-8 vote in the Senate March 16 and by voice vote in the House April 1, 1965.

In 1966, again with little controversy, the Congress further improved the MDTA program.

The 1966 MDTA amendments added new programs which (1) help train and educate workers 45 years or older, and (2) provide part-time courses to up-grade skills of employed and unemployed workers to ease critical skill shortages.

The 1966 bill also reduced requirements for training allowances, broadened eligibility for training programs, and authorized medical services for workers not eligible for training because of physical defects.

The 1966 bill was approved by voice votes in the House Sept. 19 and in the Senate Oct. 13, 1966.

Housing-Urban Development Department

In line with proposals by President Kennedy and President Johnson, the 89th Congress voted to set up a cabinet-level Department of Housing and Urban Development. The AFL-CIO has long supported such action to give more adequate attention to the needs of big city urban areas.

On a roll call vote June 16, 1965 the House voted to set up the new department to help city people.

The House-passed bill transferred to the Secretary of the new Department of Housing and Urban Development all the functions, powers, and duties of the Housing and Home Finance Agency, the Federal Housing Administration, the Public Housing Administration, and the Federal National Mortgage Association. The bill gave the Secretary various other activities relating to housing and urban affairs.

Transportation Department

The 89th Congress set up a new Department of Transportation as the 12th cabinet-level executive agency. The new department brings together major federal agencies and functions involving spending about $6 billion a year on safety and support for aviation, highways, railways, and pipelines.

The Transportation Department does not include the Maritime Administration, which continues in the Commerce Department. The AFL-CIO supported establishment of the Department of Transportation, but urged that the Maritime Administration be set up as an independent agency.

Regulatory and rate-setting functions remain in the Interstate Commerce Commission and other regulatory agencies. Urban transportation activities remain in the Department of Housing and Urban Development, but there is a possibility that some parts of the urban transportation program may be transferred to the new Transportation Department.

President Johnson proposed establishment of the Department of Transportation in a message to Congress March 2, 1966. The House Government Operations Committee on July 15, 1966 approved a revised version of the President's proposal which had been worked out in a subcommittee headed by Rep. Chet Holifield (D-Calif.).

The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, headed by Rep. Edward Garmatz (D-Md.), on Aug. 8, 1966 approved for House floor action a bill to create an independent Federal Maritime Administration. The AFL-CIO and its affiliated maritime unions supported this bill, but there was no further action on it in the 89th Congress.

However, when the Transportation Department bill came up for House floor action, Garmatz proposed an amendment to exclude maritime activities from the new department, and the House passed the Garmatz amendment 261-117 on August 30, 1966. The House then went on to pass the bill 336-42.

The Senate on Sept. 29 passed a different version of the Transportation Department bill by a 64-2 vote. The Senate bill put the Maritime Administration into the new department but gave it final authority in certain areas: (1) maritime subsidy payments and (2) certain other important maritime decision-making functions involving public hearings.

In the final Senate-House conference committee bill, approved Oct. 13, 1966, the Maritime Administration was completely removed from the Department of Transportation. It remains under the Secretary of Commerce.

Housing-Demonstration Cities

A major accomplishment of the 89th Congress was passage of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966.

The key feature of this omnibus bill was a $900 million "demonstration cities" plan to rebuild entire urban areas in some 60 to 70 cities by pulling together existing urban renewal activities and other federal aid programs into a coordinated attack on urban blight. The federal share could go up to 80 percent.

Another important feature of the bill was support for construction of facilities for group practice of medicine. This was a long-sought goal of the AFL-CIO. The bill authorizes FHA mortgage insurance for construction of buildings or for equipment in buildings for group practice of medicine, dentistry, or optometry.

Other significant new programs in the omnibus bill were (1) federal land development mortgage insurance for "new towns," (2) incentive grants for comprehensive metropolitan planning, (3) new federal "metropolitan expediters" to help local city governments at their request, and (4) urban information centers to help cities under 100,000 population.

The Senate passed an omnibus housing bill 61-3 on Aug. 12, 1966 and passed a separate "demonstration cities" bill 53-22 on Aug. 19. The House Banking and Currency Committee reported a combined version of the Senate legislation Sept. 1.

On a roll call vote Oct. 14, 1966 the House voted to defeat a Republican motion to kill the "demonstration cities" part of the 1966 omnibus housing bill.

Voting for the "demonstration cities" program 175
(164 Democrats, 11 Republicans)

Voting against the "demonstration cities" program 149
(64 Democrats, 85 Republicans)

The House then went on to pass the omnibus 1966 housing bill by a 178-141 vote. The House-passed bill included language, accepted by floor managers for the bill, which made a specific declaration that nothing in the bill would require forced busing of school children or any change in the neighborhood concept of schools. This language was included in the Senate-House conference committee report approved by the Senate 38-22 on Oct. 18 and by the House 142-126 on Oct. 20, 1966.

Housing-Rent Subsidies

The omnibus housing bill approved by the 89th Congress in 1965 was a significant step forward toward the housing goals of the AFL-CIO—a higher rate of housing construction to wipe out slums and to make available good homes at reasonable costs for all families in America.

One new, important, controversial, hard-fought feature of the omnibus bill was a rent supplement plan to help low-income families live in decent homes. The bill also authorized more than $7 million over a four-year period for a variety of programs, including existing programs of low-rent housing, urban renewal, middle-income housing, mortgage insurance, and housing for the elderly.

Before passing the 1965 omnibus housing bill, the House narrowly defeated a motion by Rep. James Harvey (R-Mich.) to kill the rent supplement provisions.

On a roll call vote June 30, 1965 the House defeated the Republican effort to kill the rent supplement plan to help low-income families.

Voting to keep rent supplements 208
(204 Democrats, 4 Republicans)

Voting to kill rent supplements 202
(72 Democrats, 130 Republicans)

This victory on the rent supplement issue was achieved after the supporters of the new plan agreed to limit payment of supplements to families whose income were low enough to make them eligible for public housing. Under the plan, an eligible person would pay for rent an amount equal to 25 percent of his income and the rent supplement would cover the rest. The House voted final passage of the omnibus housing bill, including the rent supplement plan, by a 245-169 vote on June 30, 1965.

The Senate passed the housing bill 54-30 on July 15 after defeating an anti-rent supplement proposal by Sen. John Tower (R-Tex.) by a 47-40 vote.

The Senate also passed by voice vote an amendment by Sen. Thomas Kuchel (R-Calif.) to broaden Davis-Bacon prevailing wage requirements to cover new programs authorized by the 1965 bill. Senator Wallace Bennett (R-Utah) tried to limit the effect of the Kuchel amendment to federally aided residential buildings for the use of 12 or more families. The Bennett amendment was defeated.

On a roll call vote July 14, 1965 the Senate voted for stronger Davis-Bacon prevailing wage protections.

Voting right on Davis-Bacon 51
(41 Democrats, 10 Republicans)

Voting wrong on Davis-Bacon 35
(16 Democrats, 19 Republicans)

The Senate went on to pass the 1965 omnibus housing bill by a 54-30 vote July 15, 1966.

For the rent supplement program, the final 1965 housing bill authorized $30 million in fiscal 1966, $35 million in fiscal 1967, $40 million in fiscal 1968, and $45 million in fiscal 1969. The Congress failed to provide funds in 1965 to get the rent supplement program under way. Although the Senate voted 45-37 on Oct. 20, 1965 to provide $12 million in a supplemental appropriations bill, the House voted 185-162 to cut out the rent supplement funds. The House position prevailed in the final 1965 action on the supplemental appropriations bill.

In 1966 the Congress appropriated $12 million for the rent subsidy program in fiscal 1966 and $20 million for fiscal 1967, but this was achieved only after a series of close cliff-hanger votes.

One test vote came in the House on a recommit motion March 29, 1966 by Rep. Frank Bow (R-Ohio) to knock the $12 million rent subsidy appropriations out of the fiscal 1966 second supplemental appropriations bill.

On a roll call vote March 29, 1966 the House voted to put $12 million into the fiscal 1966 rent subsidy program.
Voting for rent subsidy funds 198
(192 Democrats, 6 Republicans)
Voting against rent subsidy funds 190
(65 Democrats, 125 Republicans)

The Senate narrowly upheld the $12 million rent subsidy appropriations against a move by its Appropriations Committee to knock this money out of the fiscal 1966 supplemental appropriations bill.

On a roll call vote April 27, 1966 the Senate voted to keep the $12 million fiscal 1966 rent subsidy program.
Voting for rent subsidy funds 46
(41 Democrats, 5 Republicans)
Voting against rent subsidy funds 45
(19 Democrats, 26 Republicans)

Thus, with close but favorable votes in both Senate and House, the first money for the 1965 rent supplement program was finally made available in 1966. But the fight over funds for the controversial program continued.

The House overruled its Appropriations Committee and restored $20 million for the rent subsidy program to the appropriations bill containing fiscal 1967 funds for the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The action came on an amendment by Rep. Edward Boland (D-Mass.).

On a roll call vote May 10, 1966 the House voted to restore $20 million for fiscal 1967 rent subsidies to help poor families live in decent housing.

Voting for rent subsidies 192
(186 Democrats, 6 Republicans)
Voting against rent subsidies 188
(69 Democrats, 119 Republicans)

When the HUD fiscal 1967 appropriations bill reached the Senate floor, the rent subsidy funds again came under attack. Senator John Tower (R-Tex.) proposed an amendment to cut the $20 million rent subsidy funds out of the bill.

On a roll call vote Aug. 10, 1966 the Senate refused to cut fiscal 1967 rent subsidy funds.

Voting for rent subsidy funds 51
(43 Democrats, 8 Republicans)
Voting against rent subsidy funds 38
(16 Democrats, 22 Republicans)

Both the 1966 and 1967 appropriation bills had local control provisions which permit local government officials to block rent supplement projects which are not located in an urban renewal area.

Mass Transit

The 89th Congress continued and expanded federal aid for development of urban mass transportation.

In 1966 Congress extended the Urban Mass Transportation Act of 1964 through fiscal 1968 and and 1969 with $150 million authorized for each year. The 1966 amendments to the 1964 mass transit aid legislation authorized new grant programs and stepped up support for research, demonstration, and development of new urban transportation systems.

Technical changes made in the labor protection provisions of the 1964 Act—Senator Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) made clear in statements explaining the amendments—did not in any way change the substantive requirements written into the 1964 law.

The Senate passed the 1966 amendments bill 65-18 Aug. 15, 1966 and the House passed a similar bill 236-127 Aug. 16. The final conference report was approved by voice vote in the Senate and by a 156-86 House vote Aug. 26, 1966.

High Speed Transportation

The 89th Congress enacted a new $90 million three-year program of aid for research and development of high speed transportation, particularly in the Washington-to-Boston "Northeast Corridor."

Protections for workers similar to the labor protection provisions included in the 1964 mass transit aid legislation were included in the high speed transportation research program.

The Senate passed the high speed transportation bill by voice vote on July 23, 1965 and the House passed an amended version 317-24 on Sept. 2, 1965. The conference committee version enacted later in September included the labor protections of the House-passed bill.

D.C. Rapid Transit

In 1965 the 89th Congress authorized construction of a $431 million, 25-mile rapid transit system for the District of Columbia. The system, to be operated through contracts with private concerns, included AFL-CIO-supported labor protections similar to those included in the 1964 mass transit aid law.

In the fiscal 1967 D. C. appropriations bill, approved near the end of the 1966 session, the Congress provided $4.5 million to get the D. C. rail transit construction under way. The regional transit system will serve Washington, D.C., and suburban areas in nearby Maryland and Virginia.

In 1966 the Congress gave its consent to the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority compact between Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. The compact makes possible coordinated planning, financing and operation of the transit system by the WMATA in the local political jurisdictions.

Patent Policies

Research and development expenditures by the federal government have risen over the past decade from $3 billion to $15 billion. This enormous investment in research and development in both defense and non-defense activities, requires protection of the public interest against monopolization by a handful of giant corporations which receive nearly two-thirds of all federal funds.

The AFL-CIO, in 1965 patent policy hearings of the Senate Government Operations Committee, supported bills introduced by Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) and Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.). Their bills coincided with the AFL-CIO position that all patents developed by public funds should be in the public domain, the ownership retained by the United States, the contractor receiving a non-exclusive, royalty-free license and that the patent be available for use by other firms through cross-licensing procedures.

A "patent give-away" bill sponsored by Sen. John McClellan (D-Ark.) was approved by the Senate Government Operations Committee in 1966, but there was no floor action on the bill in the 89th Congress.

Wheat Shipping

A 1963 executive order by President Kennedy required that at least 50 percent of all surplus agricultural commodities sold to Soviet bloc countries—including wheat—must be transported in United States flag ships.

In 1965 the Senate Agriculture Committee voted Sept. 2 to add to the House-passed omnibus farm bill an amendment supported by some wheat-state senators to undercut and to end the 50-50 requirement.

The AFL-CIO and affiliated unions strongly opposed this amendment, which would have adversely affected job opportunities for longshore and maritime workers. A detailed statement of the AFL-CIO position by President George Meany went to all senators. On Sept. 10, 1965 the Senate struck out the anti-50-50 amendment by voice vote.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings later in September 1965 on the 50-50 executive order. Eleven members of the committee sent a letter Oct. 7, 1965 to President Johnson asking him to revoke the 50-50 requirement.

CONSERVATION AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Clean Water

The 89th Congress was the most important in the history of the nation's efforts to control and stop water pollution.

Two vitally important new "clean water" laws were approved by the 89th Congress. To back its 1965 support for effective new water quality standards, the Congress approved a massive $3.9 billion water pollution control program in 1966.

The first big breakthrough toward effective national standards for water purity came in the Water Quality Act of 1965. This law required states to set and enforce water quality standards for all interstate waters within their boundaries. If the states fail to do this or set inadequate standards by June 30, 1967, the federal government will move in to set and enforce effective water quality standards.

The 1965 law also liberalized and expanded the Federal Water Pollution Control Act by increasing federal grants-in-aid to municipal sewage treatment projects, helped local communities construct separated sewers, and established a new Federal Water Pollution Control Administration directly under an Assistant Secretary of HEW. The Congress appropriated $141 million for fiscal 1967 water pollution control grants.

The Senate passed this legislation 68-8 on Jan. 28, 1965. The House passed an amended version Apr. 28 by a 396-0 vote after committee action striking out the provision preserving U. S. title to federally financed patentable devices and the provisions for federal water quality standards. Although the patent provisions were omitted from the final Senate-House conference committee version, the standard-setting provisions were included.

The 1965 housing legislation approved by Congress authorized $700 million on a 50-50 matching basis for communities to improve their sewage collection systems. The 1965 regional economic development legislation approved by Congress allows 80 percent federal grants to localities in economically depressed areas for construction of sewage disposal plants and sewage collection.

In 1966 the 89th Congress followed up its breakthrough on water quality standards with a massive federal aid program of grants to stimulate state and local water pollution control activities.

The Clean Waters Restoration Act of 1966 vastly strengthens federal water pollution control enforcement. It authorizes $3.9 billion for federal anti-pollution programs over a five-year period, mainly for grants to local communities to build sewage treatment plants. It also contains incentives for states to help pay for local sewage treatment plants.

The Senate passed a six-year $6 billion water pollution control bill by a 90-0 vote July 13 and the House passed a five-year $2.5 billion bill 313-0 Sept. 30, 1966. The final $3.9 version was approved Oct. 7, 1966.

Clean Air

In 1965 and again in 1966 the 89th Congress passed legislation expanding support for programs to protect the nation's air resources. The Clean Air Act of 1963 had established for the first time a federal program to stop air pollution.

In 1965 the 89th Congress passed a bill to strengthen the Clean Air Act. The 1965 amendments provided for federal standards and enforcement over emissions from new gasoline powered motor vehicles, regulation of their sale or resale in interstate commerce, and development of proposed federal standards for diesel driven vehicles by Sept. 1967.

The 1965 law put no deadline on application and enforcement of auto exhaust standards. However, on March 29, 1966 the Department of Health, Education and Welfare issued final standards which apply to most automobiles, starting with the 1968 models. Starting with 1967 models, autos bought by the federal government for civilian use must have exhaust control and various safety features.

Other provisions of the 1965 law supported accelerated research in cause and cure of pollution from gas and diesel powered vehicles; and a stepped-up two-year program of research and grants-in-aid to the states to help stop air pollution from solid wastes.

In 1966 the Congress further expanded the existing program of federal grants for state, local, and regional air pollution control activities.

The 1966 bill, which had no opposition, authorized $46 million for grants in fiscal 1967, $66 million for fiscal 1968, and $74 million for fiscal 1969. These funds will help start, maintain and improve air pollution prevention and control programs.

Park-Recreation Areas

Major achievements in preservation of national parks and recreation areas took place in the 89th Congress.

In addition to the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore (see below), the 89th Congress authorized Pictured Rocks National Lakeshore in Michigan, Cape Lookout National Seashore in North Carolina, Guadalupe Mountain National Park in Texas, Bighorn Canyon National Recreation Area in Montana and Wyoming, Tocks Island National Recreation Area in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, Spruce Knob-Seneca Rocks National Recreation Area in West Virginia, Whiskeytown-Shasta-Trinity National Recreation Area in California, and Assateague Island National Seashore in Maryland and Virginia.

The Congress also increased funds authorized for Point Reyes National Seashore near San Francisco, California, and authorized Wolf Trap Farm Park in Virginia, 13 miles from Washington, D.C. Wolf Trap Farm Park will be the first national park devoted primarily to the performing arts.

Indiana Dunes

The 89th Congress approved establishment of an 11,000-acre Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore national park along the south shore of Lake Michigan.

The Indiana Dunes park will be available for swimming, sunbathing, hiking, picnicking, camping, photography, nature study, fishing, and other recreation uses by some 9.5 million people within a 100-mile radius around the Chicago-Gary (Ind.) area.

President Johnson's Feb. 8, 1965 message to the Congress on natural beauty gave special emphasis to the Indiana Dunes as worthy of preservation for future recreation use. Senator Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) led the fight for the Indiana Dunes park in the Senate, which passed the bill by voice vote June 21, 1965. House approval came next year near the end of the session by a 204-141 vote Oct. 14, 1966.

Highway Beautification

A "highway beauty" bill strongly supported by President Johnson was enacted by the 89th Congress in 1965. The new law authorizes the use of $80 million in federal funds over a two-year period to pay 75 percent of the cost of compensating billboard and junkyard owners for removal, screening, or landscaping.

If a state fails to comply with control requirements, the Secretary of Commerce can withhold 10 percent of the federal-aid highway funds to which the state would normally be entitled.

TVA Borrowing

To help expand Tennessee Valley Authority power development, the 89th Congress raised the existing $750 million TVA borrowing limit by $1 billion.

The $1 billion increase in the TVA revenue bond authority will finance power-generating and power-transmission facilities in the TVA area.

President Johnson proposed the bond ceiling increase May 20, 1966. Without opposition, the House approved the proposal by voice vote June 9 and the Senate passed it by voice vote July 27, 1966.

Dickey-Lincoln Power

Lower cost power for New England came closer as a result of action by the 89th Congress on the Dickey-Lincoln School project on the St. John River in Maine.

The first federal electric power project in New England, the Dickey-Lincoln project was included in the 1965 omnibus rivers-harbors-flood control bill, which authorized initial steps toward planning and construction of the $227 million project.

The Senate included the Dickey-Lincoln project when it passed the omnibus rivers-harbors authorization bill by voice vote July 27, 1965. However, on a roll call vote Sept. 22, 1965 the House voted 207-185 to eliminate the Dickey-Lincoln New England power project. Senate conferees stood firm on the Dickey-Lincoln project, and a Senate-House conference committee report including the project in the omnibus rivers-harbors bill was approved by Senate voice vote Oct. 19, 1965. The House accepted the conference report 221-139 on Oct. 20, 1965 after sponsors of the omnibus authorization bill pointed out that it provided projects in 240 congressional districts which might be lost if the conference report was rejected. The next day the House voted approval of a motion to add $800,000 for pre-construction planning of the Dickey-Lincoln School project in the 1966 supplemental appropriations bill.

On a roll call Oct. 22, 1965, the House voted to appropriate pre-construction planning money for the Dickey-Lincoln project.

Voting against the Dickey-Lincoln project 162

In 1966 the 89th Congress appropriated $1.1 million in additional planning funds as part of the 1967 public works appropriation bill.

In addition to generating "'federal yardstick" low cost hydro-electric power, thus stimulating the New England economy and opening up more job opportunities in the region, the Dickey-Lincoln project will directly create more than 3,300 jobs over a six-year period, according to AFL-CIO estimates.

Bonneville Power

The 89th Congress authorized construction of a $390 million third power plant at Grand Coulee Dam in Washington State. The new power plant will add 3.6 million kilowatts of capacity to the two million existing nameplate rating at Grand Coulee and will raise it again to its former position as the world's largest single hydro-electric project.

In the same bill, the Congress set basic accounting procedures for repayment of power project construction costs and of some irrigation project costs with sale of power by Bonneville Power Administration, which markets all power from federal dams on the Columbia River system.

The Senate passed the Grand Coulee bill June 16, 1965 without provisions setting Columbia River basin accounting procedures. The House added the accounting provisions to the bill April 19, 1966, and the Senate agreed to the House bill on June 2, 1966.

In other action, the 89th Congress approved an administration request for $1 million to start construction of the proposed Bonneville Power Administration's power line into Southern Idaho. This item was included in the fiscal 1966 public works appropriation bill finally approved by the House and Senate in October 1965.

Westlands Acreage Limits

To promote private family-farm land-ownership, federal reclamation law limits landholding in federally irrigated areas to 160 acres.

However, in the Westlands Irrigation District in the Central Valley Project of California, 75 percent of the land is held in excess of the 160-acre limitation.

The AFL-CIO strongly urged that the 89th Congress insist on enforcement of acreage ownership restriction laws. The AFL-CIO called for withholding of appropriations for water-delivery system construction in the Westlands District until the giant landholders in the area signed recordable contracts, formal expressions of intent, to give up their excess landholdings.

However, in 1965 the only test vote on the acreage limitation was lost when the Senate by a vote of 50 to 24 defeated an amendment by Senator Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) to cut $10 million for Westlands from a public works appropriations bill.

In 1966 the AFL-CIO, in testimony before the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, again urged the Congress to take legislative action against monopolistic landholding in violation of federal reclamation law. However, there was no further action on this issue by the 89th Congress.

CONGRESSIONAL REFORM

House Rules Committee

The power of the House Rules Committee to block or delay liberal legislation stems from the need to set limits on debate and amendments to important, controversial legislation. The 435-member House needs rules on floor action to prevent a determined minority from killing legislation with prolonged debate on a multitude of amendments. Therefore, the Rules Committee sets the time and terms of debate by a "rule." If the Rules Committee fails to grant such a rule for a bill, the supporters of the bill have serious problems in getting the bill to the floor of the House for a vote on its merits.

In 1965, revolutionary limitations on the power of the Rules Committee were adopted by the House of Representatives. These curbs on the Rules Committee were made possible by the 1964 election of 51 new liberal congressmen, by the support of the Democratic leadership in the House, and by the support of the Democratic Study Group and its leadership.

On the first day of the 1965 session the House voted 224-201 to make three changes in House rules, two of the changes further weakening the power of the House Rules Committee to block House action on liberal legislation. (1) A new "21-day rule" permits the Speaker to recognize a committee chairman or another member of the committee to bring up a bill for House action if the bill has been before the Rules Committee for 21 days without favorable Rules Committee action. HR 77, the bill to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley law, was brought up July 26, 1965 under this new 21-day rule. (2) Another rule now enables a majority vote in the House to send a bill to conference. Previously, a single objection to sending the bill to conference required a two-thirds majority vote or House Rules Committee action. The Rules Committee could deny a rule and thus effectively kill a controversial bill. (3) The third rules change ended the ability of a single congressman to delay final action on a bill pending receipt of an "engrossed" printed, certified final copy of the bill as amended by floor action.

On a roll call vote January 4, 1965 the House approved changes weakening the power of the Rules Committee to block or delay liberal legislation.

In 1966 the conservative Dixiecrat chairman of the House Rules Committee, 86-year-old Congressman Howard Smith (D-Va.), went down to defeat in a Democratic primary contest. For years a leader of the conservative-Dixiecrat-Republican coalition in the House of Representatives, Smith often used his chairmanship of the Rules Committee to water down liberal social legislation or to prevent such legislation from reaching the floor of the House for a vote.

House Labor Committee Rules

The House Education and Labor Committee voted 27-1 on September 22, 1966 to curb the power of the committee chairman, Congressman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) and to give greater power to the committee majority and to subcommittee chairmen.

Committee chairmen in the Congress have been chosen on the basis of seniority. They normally have broad powers to dispose of legislation, to reward supporters and to punish opponents. The committee "revolt" stemmed from Chairman Powell's refusal to call up for House floor action several major bills approved by his committee, including anti-poverty and situs picketing legislation. The chairman's absenteeism and arbitrary dismissal of committee staff personnel were related issues in the "revolt."

Under the changed House Labor Committee rules, bills approved by subcommittees were to be scheduled automatically for a vote in the full committee. The full committee was to meet regularly each week. Subcommittee chairmen were authorized to call up their bills for action on the House floor if the committee chairman refused to do so.

The new rules also provided that (1) the ranking majority member would preside if the chairman were absent from a committee meeting; (2) the committee majority and not the chairman would create additional subcommittees, if more than the six standing subcommittees—with newly defined jurisdictions—were needed; (3) the chairman was required to refer all bills to the appropriate standing subcommittee unless the committee made some alternate decision; (4) the chairman should recommend to the Speaker as conferees on a bill the members of the subcommittee which considered the bill; (5) preparation of the committee budget would involve consultation with majority and minority members; and (6) standing subcommittees and the minority would control hiring and firing of their staffs.

The committee rules adopted September 22 were made effective for the remainder of the 1966 session but they were subject to renewal when the 90th Congress convenes in January 1967. Although Powell had initially attacked the rules reform sponsors and abstained from voting on the new committee rules, he hailed the new rules as "salutory and progressive," as "a very significant step forward," and he said he hoped other committees would "adopt rules such as mine."

Senate Filibuster

The AFL-CIO considers change in Rule 22 to be the most important single needed Senate rule reform. Rule 22 should be changed to provide that after sufficient discussion in which every senator is given ample opportunity to present his view, and every protection in extended to the minority, Senate debate can be concluded by a simple majority vote.

In the 89th Congress, Rule 22 continued to enable a minority to thwart the will of a majority. Rule 22 protects filibusters by requiring a two-thirds majority vote to invoke cloture and thus to break a filibuster.

The filibuster, often used by Southerners opposed to civil rights legislation, was also used successfully in the 89th Congress by an anti-labor Dixiecrat-Republican coalition opposed to repeal of Section 14(b). Advocates of changes in Rule 22 have long pointed out that it was just as serious a block to economic and social legislation as it has been to civil rights bills.

Early in the 1965 session Senate liberals renewed their fight to change Rule 22 to allow three-fifths of senators present and voting—instead of two-thirds—to cut off prolonged filibuster "debate."

Debate on the Rule 22 change started Jan. 6 and ended Jan. 8 when the reform proposals were referred to the Senate Rules Committee. The proposals referred were S. Res. 6, sponsored by Sen. Clinton Anderson (D-N.Mex.) amending Rule 22 to permit a three-fifths majority of senators present and voting to cut off debate and S. Res. 8, sponsored by Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.), amending Rule 22 to allow a simple majority of the Senate membership to end a filibuster.

An exchange between Sen. Anderson and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) made it clear that all existing rights to future action on the Rule 22 reform proposals would be protected by this maneuver. The Senate Rules Committee sent the reform proposals back to the Senate on March 9, 1965 with an adverse report. However, there was no further action by the Senate on Rule 22 during the 89th Congress.

Rule 22 was still in force May 25, 1965 when the Senate by a 70-30 cloture vote cut off a five-week Southern filibuster against the 1965 voting rights bill.

However, later in the 1965 session, when the anti-labor filibuster against repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14(b) was under way, Majority Leader Mansfield's motion to cut off the one-week anti-repeal filibuster was defeated Oct. 11 with 45 senators voting for cloture and 47 senators voting against cloture. And in the 1966 session, another Mansfield motion to cut off a two-week anti-repeal filibuster failed, by a 51-48 vote, a majority for ending the filibuster but 15 votes short of the necessary two-thirds vote to invoke cloture.

In two other cloture votes the Senate again failed to break the anti-labor, anti-civil rights coalition filibuster which killed the 1966 civil rights bill. Although a majority supported the House-passed legislation, the majority was 10 short of the required two-thirds in the 52-42 vote Sept. 14, 1966, and in the 52-41 vote Sept. 19, 1966.

Change of Rule 22 should have high priority in the 90th Congress.

Congressional Reorganization

In 1965 the 89th Congress set up a Joint Committee on the Organization of the Congress to make studies and recommendations on organization and operations of the Congress. The committee was prohibited from making any recommendations about rules, parliamentary procedures, practices, and precedents of the Senate and House. The last major reorganization of Congress was the LaFollette-Monroney Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946.

The Senate approved establishment of the joint committee by an 88-0 vote Mar. 9 and the House approved it by voice vote Mar. 11. The committee, headed by Sen. Mike Monroney (D-Okla.) and Rep. Ray Madden (D-Ind.), received a wide range of suggestions at hearings in 1965.

A House Judiciary Subcommittee headed by Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) held hearings in August 1965 on President Johnson's proposal to lengthen the term of congressmen from two years to four years.

On July 21, 1966 the Joint Committee issued its report and recommendations. In its report, the Joint Committee declared that selection of comittee chairmen by seniority was a custom, not a rule. Therefore a committee majority could disregard seniority in selecting a chairman, the report said. However, the Joint Committee made no recommendation on this point.

Major recommendations included:

- A proposed "bill of rights" for committees so that a majority of committee members could call meetings and require the chairman to report legislation. The "ultimate power" should be in the committee majority, the Joint Committee said. The "bill of rights" proposal would curb the power of a committee chairman to kill bills by refusing to call a meeting of his committee or by refusing to allow committee action on a bill.
- Opening committee sessions to the public to the "maximum extent possible," including radio-TV coverage.
- Division of the House Committee on Education and Labor into a Committee on Education and a Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Creation of a Senate Committee on Education with a corresponding change in the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.
- Limiting senators' committee assignments — with existing assignments protected.
- Improved budget and fiscal controls, including greater participation by legislative committees in the appropriations process.
- Strengthened lobbying registration and disclosure requirements.
- Improved scheduling of the business of Congress, including a five-day workweek and an August recess if the Congress has not finished its business by July 31.
- Establishment of a Joint Committee on Congressional Operations to conduct a continuing study of the organization and operations of the Congress.

The Joint Committee made no recommendations on Senate Rule 22, the role of the House Rules Committee, the seniority system for selecting committee chairman, election laws and reporting of campaign contributions and spending, and the four-year term for House members.

Senator Monroney and Rep. Madden introduced bills incorporating the Joint Committee recommendations. However, there was no further action on the bills in the 1966 session.

More guns, less butter sought by President

President Johnson's message to the American people last week was "more guns and less butter," as he laid down a grim change of pace blueprint for waging war in Vietnam, seeking peace with Russia, and building a Great Society at home.

By asking for a war tax of 6 percent of a taxpayer's tax bill, the President took many by surprise who felt the economic urgency of a tax hike was gone. His bid to combine the Commerce and Labor departments startled both organized labor and businessmen alike.

The call for "less butter" was a political response to the much more conservative character of the 90th Congress, resulting from the loss of 47 Democratic House of Representatives seats in the 1966 elections.

But like those elections Johnson had something for everybody in the State of the Union message last week. The President spoke up firmly for continuing programs to expand education, health care, and to combat poverty, but at a slower pace than during the 89th Congress. He did not flick an eye in the direction of peace in Vietnam, only promising more Churchillian "sweat and agony."

"I recommend that we intensify our effort to give the poor a chance to enjoy and join in this nation's progress.

"I shall propose certain administrative changes suggested by the Congress—as well as some we have learned from our own trial and errors.

"I shall urge special methods and special funds to reach the hundreds of thousands of Americans that are now trapped in the ghettos of our big cities—and, through Headstart, to try to reach out to our very young little children. The chance to learn is their brightest hope and must command our full determination. For learning brings skills; and skills bring jobs; and jobs bring responsibility and dignity, as well as taxes."

—from President Johnson's State of the Union message, January 10, 1967

And he went out of his way to soothe any lingering Cold War bitterness between the U.S. and Russia so far as eastern Europe is concerned.

While Washington has been buzzing with speculation that U.S.-Vietnam peace talks may be underway, there was nothing new in the President's talk before a joint session of Congress last Tuesday night that could be called a new overture by our side.

President Johnson did not put a price tag on this year's batch of Great Society programs, but he clearly indicated he was in a mood to help Congress revamp and recast some of these programs. It has been assumed by most observers who try to read between the lines, that the Johnson administration will trim the cost of many Great Society programs—despite the urgency of them all.

Johnson was hawkish on Vietnam, doveish on ending the Cold War, liberal on Great Society programs, and conservative on implementation of those programs. It was a preview of the mood, the pace, and the outlook for the next two years—and the first real impact of the 1966 election results.

Change in Party Line-up

Strengthened Conservative Coalition

Congressional Quarterly, a non-government publication, has made a special study of the voting positions of incumbents and new members of the 90th Congress and compared them with the patterns of the 89th. In the Senate, where the Republicans gained only three seats, change was minimal. But in the House, where the G.O.P. gained 47 (top chart) the study found that the conservative coalition gained appreciably (chart above). This coalition is a traditional grouping of Republicans and Southern Democrats who generally resist expansion of social welfare programs. The effect of this shift on some of Johnson's major programs, as analyzed by Congressional Quarterly, is shown below.

New York Times charts

Highlights of President Johnson's State of the Union message to Congress:

Taxes: A 6 percent income tax increase on individuals and corporations. However, if approved by Congress, it probably would not become effective until July 1 and would not apply to income before that date. Exempt would be married persons whose "taxable income" (after exemptions and deductions) is under $2,000, and single persons whose taxable income is under $1,000.

Vietnam: U.S. participation in the Vietnam war to stop communist aggression and avoid paying "a far greater price" later. He could not predict when the war might end, and forecast "more cost, more loss, more agony."

Poverty War: Pledged intensified efforts "to give the poor a chance to join the nation's progress" by improving administration of existing programs, use of "special methods" and "special funds" to overcome social problems in America's city ghettos. Johnson also recommended full funds for the model cities program.

Arm Race and Defense: Called for international agreements to strengthen peace. But the President stressed that he considered his first responsibility to assure U.S. defenses so that "no nation can ever find it rational to launch a nuclear attack or to use its nuclear power as credible threat against us or our allies."

Trade: Congress should help U.S. commerce by passing an East-West trade bill and approving a consular agreement with the Soviet Union. Johnson also said he would propose creation of a single department of business and labor to combine functions of the Commerce and Labor Departments.

Communist China: Welcoming a China which could "respect her neighbors' rights," Johnson said that the United States would continue to hope for a reconciliation between Red China and the world community.

Foreign Aid: A special authorization from Congress for $200 million for East-Asian regional programs. Johnson also warned that the United States was "not prepared to see our assistance wasted" in conflict between India and Pakistan.

NATO: Called for maintaining NATO as an integrated common defense in Western Europe until such time as greater security can be achieved through arms control and disarmament agreements.

Budget: His budget for the next fiscal year will call for $135 billion in spending and revenues of $126.9 billion, leaving a deficit of $8.1 billion.

Crime: Urged Congress to approve funds for local programs to combat crime. Johnson said that his national crime commission had not uncovered all the answers, but promised the help of the national government.

Health: Extending medicare benefits to 1.3 million Americans who are permanently and totally disabled and are under 65.

Draft: Streamlining the draft. Johnson said that the national commission on selective service would shortly submit its report on the draft.

Social Security: An average increase of 20 per cent in social security benefits to the 23 million citizens receiving payments, with a raise of 59 per cent in minimum payments.

The last 3 years bear witness to our determination to make this a better country.

We have struck down legal barriers to equality.

We have improved the education of 7 million deprived children and this year alone we have enabled almost 1 million students to go to college.

We have brought medical care to older people that were unable to afford it. Three and one-half million Americans have already received treatment under medicare since July.

We have built a strong economy that has put almost 3 million more Americans on the payrolls in the last year alone.

We have included more than 9 million new workers under a higher minimum wage.

We have launched new training programs to provide job skills for almost 1 million Americans.

We have helped more than a thousand local communities to attack poverty in the neighborhoods of the poor.

We have set out to rebuild our cities on a scale that was never attempted before.

We have begun to rescue our waters from the menace of pollution and to restore the beauty of our land and our countryside and our cities and our towns.

We have given 1 million young Americans a chance to earn through the Neighborhood Youth Corps—or through Headstart—a chance to learn.

So together, we have tried to meet the needs of our people. And, we have succeeded in creating a better life for the many as well as the few. And now we must answer whether our gains shall be the foundations of further progress, or whether they shall be only monuments to what might have been—abandoned now by a people who lacked the will to see their great work through.

I believe that our people do not want to quit—though the task is great, the work hard, often frustrating, and success is a matter of days, or months, of years—sometimes it may be even decades.

But I have come here tonight to discuss with you five ways of carrying forward the progress of these last 3 years. And these five ways concern programs and partnerships and priorities and prosperity and peace.

Senate seeks majority will changing Rule 22

The United States Senate this week was on the verge of changing the filibuster rule which prevents a majority to express its will.

As the week began, the Senate had three propositions for changing Rule 22 (which requires two-thirds of Senators present and voting to stop debate):

- Constitutional majority (51 Senators) to vote for cloture, ending debate, supported by an impressive bipartisan group;
- Three-fifths of those present and voting (67 Senators if all 100 are present and voting, or 54 if only 90 Senators are voting);
- Constitutional three-fifths (61 Senators) majority of entire membership of 100 Senators.

The battlelines were drawn all week as the Senate sought a way to allow a majority of Senators to reach a vote. Last year's civil rights bill and repeal of 14-b banning union shop agreements were both killed by Rule 22, as presently written. Thus 34 Senators (one more than one-third of the Senate) can now keep and frequently have kept a bill from reaching a vote in the Senate.

Some 180 civil rights organizations in the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights including the AFL-CIO and the UAW are presently working to attain "the constitutional majority" change in Rule 22, so 51 Senators could end debates.

Write Your Senator Today

Your own Senator should hear from you this week, asking his support of majority rule in ending Senate filibusters. Ask him to support constitutional majority of 51, ending Rule 22.

Rules should apply to all

The crying need in Congress is for a reform in rules that will accord equal treatment to all of its members.

The action Congress took against Adam Clayton Powell will be measured against the steps it now takes to establish a uniform code of ethics, standards of conduct and rules of procedure.

If Congress believes as we do, that a member should not use public funds for private activities, then this principle should be adopted as a rule of Congress and strictly enforced against all members.

If the Democrats in Congress believe, as we do, that seniority should not be controlling in determing committee chairmanships, then let them set standards of conduct for all committee chairmen and deny chairmanship to all who fail to live up to such standards.

For it has been a long-standing principle in our American democracy that all punitive action, whether in Congress, in the courts or elsewhere, should be based on established rules and standards and not on individual proscriptions.

We therefore call upon Congress to adopt a code of ethics for all of its members, to democratize its rules of procedure and to set standards of conduct for all committee chairmen.

—Statement of Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, January 12, 1967.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

It was a rough week—the opening week of the 90th Congress. There wasn't much good news. John Fogarty who guided billions for education and welfare through Congress died on opening day. We lost the 21 day rule in the House of Representatives. Many Negroes felt personally affronted when Adam Powell was singled out and denied his seat in Congress. The President's State of the Union message was a cautious recital of how the administration expects to move more gingerly through this Congress. And there were the usual rumblings of a possible sellout on Rule 22 in the Senate, where chances for getting genuine majority rule are better this time than ever before. . . . The real bombshell, from labor's standpoint and among business too, was Johnson's proposal to combine departments of Labor and Commerce. There are some statistical gathering functions of both which may overlap, but it's hard to see any justification for putting them under one roof. There's better case for combining Agriculture and Interior into Department of Natural Resources. . . . John Fogarty's sudden death was symbolic of troubles ahead for getting money from House Appropriations Committee to pay for education, health research and care, and other Great Society programs. Fogarty's subcommittee lost three stalwart members in elections. With Fogarty's loss and conservative makeup of House Appropriations Committee, it's going to be hellish trying to get money to take care of America's multiplying problems. . . . Some moderate Republicans elected last year claim to be problem-solvers and shy away from "conservative" or "liberal" labels—yet only 26 Republicans joined with 159 Democrats for total of 185 votes to keep 21 day rule in House, as against 232 conservative Democrats and Republicans who voted to abolish this rule. A handful of freshmen Republicans voted right on this question, but there were alarming signs the old Dixiecrat-Republican coalition was back in the saddle. . . . Under Secretary of Labor John Henning goes to New Zealand as U.S. ambassador in a reshuffling of Labor Department hierarchy. James Reynolds, Labor Department's top mediator, moves up as second in command to Willard Wirtz. . . . Another stab at getting a fair housing bill through Congress is scheduled by Administration, but nobody's sure what kind of bill President will seek this year. . . . Truth-in-lending which Sen. Paul Douglas tried so hard to win is having new lease on life under Sen. Bill Proxmire's tutelage. Proxmire has new approach which may find approval this year. Johnson gave it a plug in his State of the Union message, which'll help. . . . There was no call for any tougher labor legislation in President's message, unlike two years ago when LBJ asked for an emergency disputes law during New York subway strike. . . . New York's Sen. Javits left Senate Judiciary Committee so Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina could have a berth. He'll team up with Sen. Eastland of Mississippi to put the double-whammy on judicial appointments not to their liking. . . . Many southern Congressmen and Senators are elected and re-elected by a handful of voters in their states—but there was oddly no move to depose them or deny them a seat this year. Why? Why? Why? . . . Prof. Dick Wade of University of Chicago writing in current issue of The Reporter blames white backlash spurred on by Illinois Republicans and now Sen. Percy for defeat of Sen. Paul Douglas. Wade makes devastating case showing how Percy's campaign strategy "offered Negro voters a pledge on open occupancy while promising to protect white neighborhoods from Negro incursions." What Percy really stood for, but never said or was confronted with, was locking the ghetto doors so Negroes could never escape. Douglas never minced words, never trimmed his convictions, while Percy in words of Douglas raised "vacillation to the level of moral principle," being all things to all people. . . . There'll be hot debate at "Tight Money Crisis" conference next week between Leon Keyserling and top economist of U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Many UAW and other labor people will attend. UAW Vice President Pat Greathouse is among rally sponsors. . . . New York's Cong. Ben Rosenthal comes up with idea for "info-tags" modelled after Swedish custom, giving consumers information on durability of rugs, how long coffee pots take to percolate, that sort of thing. . . . How many strikes did we have, what did they cost? U.S. Department of Labor notes strike idleness averaged 0.16 percent of total working time during whole 1960-1966 period—that's half what it was during 1950's when annual loss came to 0.32 percent. A FILIBUSTER STOPS THE DRIVE AGAINST FILIBUSTERS

If only there were some way to drape this MEMO black! The fight to change the filibuster rule at the opening of the 90th Congress had good prospects for success. It is painful to have to record now how that effort was defeated..

Every Congress Since 1953

To those who are sick of seeing the Senate strangle good legislation in talk and who have waged the campaign to change Rule 22 every two years since 1953, the new Congress appeared to offer a splendid opportunity. Vice President Humphrey, who as a Senator was one of the half dozen men who initiated the first effort to change the Rule, was going to preside. It seemed fairly certain he would make the crucial ruling: that a majority of the Senate has the power at the opening of a new Congress to change its rules. It also appeared that the mood of the incoming Senators was favorable for change.

The Campaign Begins

On January 12, the principal bipartisan resolutions to change Rule 22 were introduced by Senators George McGovern (D., S.D.) and Thomas Kuchel (R., Calif.) As always happens, the proposals were met with a filibuster by Southern Democrats and Republican reactionaries, ready to defend the Senate's sacred right to talk itself to death.

On Wednesday, January 18, a carefully planned move to stop the filibuster got underway and here the action moved into the rarified, chess-like atmosphere of higher parliamentary procedure. Mr. McGovern, whose resolution to take up a rules change was on the floor, moved under the Constitution that the debate be ended, a motion that he said could be adopted by a majority. Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen raised a point of order, insisting a majority could not close debate. Mr. McGovern then indicated he was ready to move to table the point of order. This was the situation when Vice President Humphrey was asked to rule. Without facing the issue directly, he set in motion the procedure that would have made it possible for a simple majority to end debate and get on with the business of modifying Rule 22. The best hope for modification seemed to lie with the McGovern resolution, which would have reduced the number of Senators needed to end a filibuster from two-thirds of those present and voting to three-fifths, from at most 67 Senators to 60.

The Fear of Majority Rule

That resolution was never reached. McGovern and his colleagues contended that a majority could end debate in the Senate only at the opening of the session and then only on the issue of a change in the rules. But the opposition, headed by Senator Dirksen, proceeded to intimidate a good many Senators by arguing that the vote on the rules would establish a precedent whereby a majority could vote to end debate at any time on virtually any issue. Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.), a professed advocate of the three-fifths change, added to the pressures against voting with McGovern by taking up Dirksen's argument and warning that the procedure advocated by McGovern and the other champions of change would "destroy the character of the Senate as a parliamentary body." He and Dirksen and others of the opponents foresaw dire if fanciful possibilities: times when a mere handful of Senators, 6 or 7, could close debate and push the country into war or violate the rules and add legislation to an appropriations bill. In the end they prevailed. When the critical vote needed to close debate came up, the vote on the McGovern motion to table the Dirksen point of order, the needed majority wasn't there. It had dwindled down to 37 Senators who were ready to go against the combined leadership of the Senate. We enclose the vote on the McGovern motion with this MEMO.

On To Cloture

When the McGovern motion went down, the only thing left to do was to try to end debate by means of the old Rule 22. In short, two-thirds of the Senate had to be marshalled in support of changing the rule that two-thirds are needed to break a filibuster. And so the old vicious circle was set in motion again, with predictable results. The cloture petition was filed on the 19th, taken up on Tuesday, January 24, and beaten by a vote of 53 to 46. We enclose that vote with this MEMO, too. So ended the effort for 1967. Mansfield, who sometimes gives up too quickly, saw no reason to continue, even though a majority could have kept up the fight, particularly in the early days of the session when there is very little other business to consider.

A Dirksen Doublecross

It is impossible to finish this account without mentioning something more about Senator Dirksen's role in the Rule 22 maneuvers. On January 18, when he was arguing against the right of a majority to close debate, he raised a hope that he might be willing to work out some sort of compromise. "Iam in the mood now," he said, in the Senate's most cajoling voice, "if they file a cloture motion....to put my name on it and see where we go. I would then give assurance to the Senator from South Dakota (McGovern) that I will sit down with him and see if we cannot negotiate a reasonable time to discuss this matter and let it come to a vote. I do not mind. I am prepared to do it, and surely in the wisdom and genius of this body we can find the right answer without forfeiting the safeguards that have meant so much to this country."

If this meant anything, it appeared to many of his listeners to mean he would join the cloture move and support a three-fifths reform. But with Dirksen things are seldom how they seem. He signed the cloture petition but he told the press he would vote against it.

Without his help the effort was doomed. Roy Wilkins, chairman of the Leadership Conference, who had been watching the cloture fight from the gallery, emerged to tell reporters, "Senator Dirksen is inexplicable." He was struck, he said, by Dirksen's argument that the Senate is a continuing body and has not changed since its first session in 1789. "The fact that there haven't been any changes is what's wrong with the Senate," he declared. He had a warning of his own. The Senate's inability to change a rule that has been used historically to block civil rights legislation and was used precisely for that purpose in 1966, would be noted and cited by extremists as an illustration of the futility of trying to win equal rights through established channels.

What's Left?

The Senate's inability to change Rule 22 because of a fear of what a majority might do, leaves intact a rule that permits a minority to continue to dictate to the body. Senators representing less than 12 percent of the population, can continue to block the will of the majority whenever they are disposed to do so.

But the effort so many put into this year's campaign is not wasted. Something has been established. As the Washington Post pointed out editorially, "the Vice President's ruling will stand as a precedent. It means the anti-filibuster forces are free to press a motion for majority cloture at the beginning of any Senate session, that when a point of order is made against such a motion it can be voted down by a simple majority and that motion for cloture reform would then become the pending question. It is an open door to victory as soon as a majority in the Senate can find the courage to stand for the constitutional principle of government by the majority."

Until that time what can we do? It would be in order, first, for all of our organizations to express their appreciation to the 37 Senators who voted for the McGovern tabling motion. They deserve our thanks.

Looking beyond that, we must acknowledge that getting civil rights legislation through Congress without a change in Rule 22 is admittedly difficult. But we were able to surmount that obstacle in 1964 and 1965 by showing there was a national consensus for laws needed to give all citizens equal rights. In 1967, we must demonstrate again that the public sentiment for levelling the last barriers is still there. If we do that, even the Senate must respond.

EUC - Current Issues

Treasury Secretary Fowler criticizes "Monday morning quarterbacks" who are trying to prejudice the surtax proposal.

LBJ's economics meets the critics

Skeptical lawmakers question why Administration failed in its spending estimates last year—and indicate they will put the President's new economic programs to hard test

The most heated economic battles of 1966—over such issues as taxes and guideposts—were roaring again in Congress this week.

The fights erupted as the foremost watchdogs of the economy in Congress, the Joint Economic Committee, started their annual consideration of the President's Economic Report.

Whatever the outcome, the proceedings left one thing clear about the future: Any economic proposals put forth by the Administration will face tougher sledding than usual.

Split. There is now a "credibility gap" between the Johnson Administration and Congress that gives skeptical lawmakers on Capitol Hill a handy excuse for not supporting a tax increase. The proposed increase is based on the Administration's view that the economy will pick up steam toward the end of the year.

I. On the defense

As a result, Administration policymakers find themselves fighting a rearguard action, defending last year's policies, instead of making a hard sell for the proposed 6% surcharge on personal and business income taxes.

Actually, the Administration isn't yet ready to ask Congress to commit itself on higher taxes, and won't be until April or May. But the credibility strain will make things much more difficult for President Johnson's delicately balanced and intricately timed fiscal program for this year.

The committee's new chairman, Senator William Proxmire (D-Wis.), opened the hearings by reopening old wounds. The Administration, he charged, committed "a serious economic blunder" last year by its $10-billion underestimate of the cost of Vietnam. The error, he said, resulted in inflation, higher interest rates, and general confusion.

Then, the eight Republican members quickly followed with charges that "last year government policy was the chief source of uncertainty and instability in the economy," and they called on the Administration "to demonstrate that it has improved its forecasting techniques."

Led off by Gardner Ackley, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, government officials tried to explain the low estimate as a product of uncertainty about the course of the war. They gave assurances that 12 months' additional experience had given them a better fix on requirements of fighting a land war in Asia. But the Congressional committee seemed unconvinced.

Confusion. Doubts about White House fiscal policies came from both sides of the aisle. Members expressed bewilderment over why the White House refused to ask for a tax increase last spring when economic indicators were pointing up and then requested one when there was clear evidence of softness.

Ackley and his fellow CEA members, Arthur Okun and James Duesenberry, fielded hostile questions with relative calm on the opening day of hearings.

Budget Director Charles Schultze took his medicine with only a little less patience on the second. But on Washington. Polish diplomats at the U. N. leaked news of an abortive attempt in early December by the Polish representative on the International Control Commission in Vietnam to get talks started. Reportedly, he acted at the suggestion of U. S. Ambassador to South Vietnam Henry Cabot Lodge, and got Hanoi to agree to begin talking with U. S. representatives in Warsaw. Then Hanoi drew back following U. S. air raids around Hanoi.

Washington officials concede the story has some truth. But they insist that no firm agreement to negotiate was reached, and that Hanoi did not link the talks to U. S. bombing.

Another report circulated last week among East European delegations at the U. N. was that Hanoi would agree to having a caretaker government set up in Saigon, with one-third of the members representing the Ky regime, one-third the Vietcong, and one-third other groups, such as the Buddhists. As of midweek, Washington had been unable to substantiate this report.

Kennedy role. Then Senator Robert F. Kennedy (D-N. Y.) was reported to have received in Paris a North Vietnamese plan for a three-stage peace negotiation. It supposedly came from a French foreign office official acting as intermediary for Mai Van Bo, Hanoi's representative in Paris. Kennedy denied this after meeting with Johnson back in Washington. So did the French foreign office. So did Mai Van Bo.

While peace rumors fly, the President is playing his cards even closer to his chest than usual. But all indications are that he will not agree to suspend bombing of the North in exchange for a mere agreement by Hanoi to talk. Almost certainly, he will insist that the Communists make military concessions.

Johnson also remains wary of possible Communist attempts to tie peace talks to an uninspected military truce, and then drag the talks out as cover for a new military buildup. Washington might insist on fighting while parleying.

Privacy. Says one Washington official: "Look at any map of who holds what in Vietnam, and it appears as if the country had chicken pox. How can you have a cease-fire in that situation which wouldn't help the Vietcong?"

These are some of the problems Johnson will face if the current diplomatic jockeying leads to a genuine offer to negotiate. And if a bona fide offer does emerge, everyone will have to deny it. Private diplomacy seems to be the only hope of bringing the war to a conference table.

Shuffle on the shuttle

Eastern Air Lines' no-frills, guaranteed-seat shuttle concept will be put to the test on the New York-Boston run as American and Northeast jets step up battle for market

By all the laws of business logic, the last place where airlines should engage in mortal combat is in the short-haul, high-cost, low-profit Boston-New York City market. Yet that is exactly what will happen next week when American and Northeast Airlines sharply augment their service in pure jets in an effort to recapture patronage from the dominant Eastern Air Lines shuttle.

The Air Shuttle was invented by Malcolm MacIntyre, former president of Eastern, almost six years ago to fly between Washington, New York, and Boston. Planes leave at hourly intervals, and if the passengers who show up by departure time outnumber the available seats, another plane is rolled out.

Rickety image. The keys to this operation are the standby planes and crews; without them it won't work. Though nothing can be done about the wages of the standby crews, Eastern at first tried to hold costs down by using nothing but fully depreciated piston planes for its shuttle service.

When President Floyd D. Hall and his team took over, however, they discovered the image of the entire airline was being ruined by the rattly-bang old airplanes. Moreover, hard-nosed cost accounting disclosed that the shuttle was losing money. A large and powerful bloc in Eastern's new management voted to kill the service.

That was when the company discovered it couldn't be done; the shuttle had become too popular. Instead, Eastern went to Lockheed Electra turboprops and Boeing 727 jets on the first sections, keeping its piston Constellations for back-up flights. It also increased fares during rush hours.

Drawbacks. Despite all its efforts, the shuttle has never made Eastern management entirely happy. It takes too much time and effort for the money that it generates. As an Eastern official once said: "It accounts for 24% of all our passengers, 11% of domestic revenues, 8% of passenger miles—and one-twentieth of our net income."

Now that intensive competition will be met on the Boston-New York part of the run, Eastern's business may decline sufficiently to put the shuttle operation far into the red. If that happens, the company may eventually decide to back off from the shuttle concept.

What has triggered this is American's Jet Express with advance reservations required, light meals served, and drinks for sale to coach passengers. The new feature is hourly service with BAC-111 jets that American calls Astrojet 400s.

Counterattack. Faced with this kind of competition in its back yard, Northeast is beginning to upgrade its own service with a leased 110-passenger DC-9-30, a stretched version of the Douglas twin-engine jet. This plane will be able to make five round trips a day. In coming months, the Boston-based airline will put more of these jets on the route as they are delivered until it, too, has hourly jet service with snacks and beverages and advance reservations.

Not to be outdone, Eastern is countering with its own DC-9-30s; the first went into shuttle service last week. It expects to put 14 of the 55 DC-9-30s it has on order exclusively into the shuttle operation by next year, using them for first sections. Electras will make up the standby fleet.

No frills. The one thing Eastern does not anticipate is trying to compete with American and Northeast by instituting more cabin frills. Tickets will still be sold on the plane, taking up all the time of the stewardesses during the short flights.

Thus, for the first time, passengers will now have a distinct choice of service on roughly comparable jets, all flying at hourly intervals and all taking about the same trip time.

The early stages of the contest may prove inconclusive. With the initial sharp increase in the number of seats available between Boston and New York, Eastern's biggest advantage up to now—the guaranteed seat—will be negated. But the big carrier could get that edge back if demand continues to grow.

Treasury Secretary Henry H. Fowler had a weekend to read the transcript and simmer.

II. Rebuttal

On Monday, Fowler delivered a sharply worded counterattack on "Monday morning quarterbacks" who, he said, were raking up last year's debate over taxes to "prejudice" the surcharge proposals.

He argued that a general tax increase would have constituted "economic overkill" after the Federal Reserve Board moved on its own in December, 1965, to tighten credit. He implied the tax increase is needed in order to insure that the Fed continues to ease money throughout the year.

"There is," the Treasury Secretary said, "a great deal of economic difference in advocating increased income taxes to pay the increased costs of war when monetary policy is on the path toward ease than when monetary policy was moving in the direction of clear, positive, and increasing restraint."

Marking time. Still, neither Fowler nor his colleagues devoted much energy to lining up votes for the surcharge bill. They all noted that the proposal wouldn't go to Capitol Hill until spring. At that time, they promised that the Administration would reassess the direction of the economy and decide whether the tax increase was still necessary. For the present, they asked only that Congress keep an open mind.

In turn, not one Joint Economic Committee member appeared ready to embrace the idea of a tax increase. Representative Henry Reuss (D-Wis.) said that fiscal restraint should be exercised by plugging tax loopholes. Proxmire pushed for return of four of the six Army divisions stationed in Europe and for cuts in public works, space, and other "nonessential" programs.

Fowler was doubtful that either way would work. Johnson has promised legislative proposals to close tax loopholes for this session, he said, but a debate over tax reform would take too long to be of much use for fiscal restraint. Shifting troops might save foreign exchange but would probably cost more "budget dollars" than leaving them where they are. And Congress isn't about to cut the necessary "$5-billion or $6-billion" out of the budget.

But Representative Martha Griffiths (D-Mich.) of the Ways & Means Committee warned Administration officials, "You are in grave danger of not getting a tax increase no matter what you say."

The Administration fared little better with its new wage-price guidepost policy. A new Republican member of the 20-man Joint Economic Committee, Representative Donald Rumsfeld (R-Ill.), lit into the policy for "proving ineffective just when it was needed most." And Reuss hit from the other side, suggesting that the committee should hold hearings and publish its own wage settlement target since the CEA had "defaulted."

Money outflow. Concern over continued balance-of-payments problems marked a good part of the proceedings. There were constant questions about the gold drain, relations with France, and the possibility that lowering interest rates in the U. S. would start short-term capital moving back to Europe.

Administration witnesses cited the recent lowering of European rates as evidence that last month's "Chequers conference" of finance ministers had helped bring about a "coordinated downward movement" of interest rates.

"There are indications," said CEA's Okun, "that interest rates in Europe will behave better, and that should make it more feasible for us to have the kind of monetary easing we want here."

Coordination. Committee members engaged in a good bit of probing about the current state of relations between the Fed and the White House.

According to Ackley, the Fed "shares our objectives" and has been consulting "perhaps more frequently this year" on economic policy. Schultze strongly hinted that Fed Chairman William McC. Martin was brought in at an early stage for discussions that led to the tax hike proposals.

This failed to convince Mrs. Griffiths. "The Fed is responsible to Congress and it's time to bring it back to the fold before it starts stockpiling its own nuclear weapons," she said.

Even among Republicans, increased coordination of fiscal and monetary policy seemed more important than the Fed's traditionally tight-lipped independence.

In addition to conceding that economic events might sink the surtax proposal, Administration officials held out the possibility that the 7% investment credit might be restored before Jan. 1, 1968. The credit is "one of our instruments of flexibility," Ackley said, adding that the Administration wouldn't hesitate to end it, "if it were decided the economy needs the additional stimulus."

William F. McKee, FAA head, helped negotiate with airlines.

Anteing up for SST

Airlines will pay $1-million toward development for each supersonic plane they buy

U. S. airlines now seem ready to help pay for development of the supersonic transport. The Administration has suggested that they put up $1-million for each SST they plan to buy, and the airlines are not resisting the idea, as they have in the past.

The proposal was unveiled Monday to top executives of 11 airlines and one aircraft leasing company. Formal acceptance is expected soon —possibly next week—with few, if any, modifications.

That should clear the way for an Administration go-ahead on the first phase of the program, under which design competition winners Boeing Co. (for the airframe) and General Electric Co. (for the engine) will build and flight-test prototypes of the 1,800-mph plane.

Purpose. The Administration's aim is to undercut Congressional opponents and pare government costs. Under its plan the airlines would contribute $55-million, as the order book now stands. This wouldn't go far to offset the total costs of the prototype program, estimated at

$1.3-billion. But it could be used to counter arguments that the airlines were getting a free ride while taxpayers took the SST risks.

Pan American World Airways would put up $15-million; Trans World Airlines, $10-million; American Airlines and United Air Lines, $6-million each; Northwest Airlines, $4-million; Continental and Delta Air Lines and World Airways, $3-million apiece; Braniff International and Eastern Air Lines, $2-million; and Airlift International, $1-million.

Inducements. The payments would not reduce the purchase price of SSTs to the airlines involved; the cost of each plane is now estimated at $35-million to $40-million. But if the SST is a commercial success once it starts rolling off production lines around 1974, the carriers would get their money back with interest.

The Administration proposal calls for royalty payments to the airlines of $1.5-million for each $1-million invested. And the lines also presumably could treat the $1-million payments as research and development costs to reduce corporate taxes. At least, Administration officials pointed out this possibility.

Transportation Secretary Alan S. Boyd, Federal Aviation Agency Administrator William F. McKee, and SST program director Major General J. C. Maxwell also made one other point clear to the airline officials: Unless the carriers were willing to share some of the financial risk of the SST program, the Administration would not be willing to ask Congress to pay the lion's share (perhaps 90%) of the costs.

No surprise. The Administration proposal was not altogether a surprise for airline officials. The carriers already had deposited $100,000 with the Treasury for each SST delivery position they reserved—although up to now they can cancel and get refunds.

In addition, it had long been clear that once tooling up for production of the planes started—around 1971 if schedules are kept—the carriers would be asked to pay far more than the normal average of 25% progress payments prior to delivery.

None needed. Even though the Administration now has authority to commit itself to prototype construction—and has $200-million provided last year to get under way—President Johnson is expected to ask Congress for a new vote of approval.

In any case, the President would have to send Congress a supplemental request for SST funds, which were not specifically identified in his budget although they were included in his contingency fund.

Lockheed tries a new pilot

Daniel J. Haughton takes over as chairman and faces problem of replacing the business Lockheed would have had if it had won SST contract. Electronics will get push

There's one big problem facing Lockheed Aircraft Corp.'s new Chairman Daniel J. Haughton: How to find enough business to replace the $2-billion a year in sales that Lockheed might have had if it had won the contest for the supersonic transport contract.

Haughton moved into the top spot at Lockheed this week, when former Chairman Courtlandt S. Gross, 62, exercised a long-felt wish to retire. Gross, who had piloted Lockheed through the competition to build the SST, saw the contract go to arch-competitor Boeing Co.

That loss illuminated one of Lockheed's continuing weaknesses—its capacity in electronics. This week's top-level transition, though, demonstrated one of Lockheed's strengths—its depth of homegrown management.

Haughton, 55, is a 28-year company veteran. He had been president of Lockheed since 1961. Replacing him in that office is A. Carl Kotchian, 25 years at Lockheed and executive vice-president of the company since 1965.

The transition came smoothly, mainly because of Lockheed's capacity for finding its executives young, spotting the talented ones, and giving them increasing responsibilities and a chance to develop.

Daniel J. Haughton takes on the job of running highly diversified Lockheed.

Haughton, though, will have anything but a smooth life as chairman. While he was president, he oversaw the company's projects, helping division chiefs and making adjustments before any of them got into serious trouble. As chairman, he will have to turn from supervising projects to initiating them, and setting policy lines as well.

Major task. One of his prime jobs will be to build up Lockheed's capacity in electronics. After 10 years of trying, Lockheed Electronics Co. still hasn't topped $60-million a year, a pale performance compared with the electronics division of North American Aviation, Inc., which had 1966 sales of $431-million.

In the early 1950s Lockheed tried to make a "great leap forward" in electronics by buying Hughes Aircraft Co., which at the time had a virtual hammerlock on radar fire control systems for aircraft. It couldn't close the deal. After that, Lockheed management shunned electronics acquisitions, citing their high price-earnings ratio.

But now, Haughton may have to take the merger route, expensive or not.

Haughton will also seek new business in Lockheed's present operations, which are well-diversified: reconaissance, fighter, anti-submarine and cargo aircraft; the Polaris missile; a business jet; the Agena spacecraft; and rocket motors, ships, bridges, and dams.

Haughton will study closely the market for another commercial plane, the so-called air bus, which would cover the same air routes as the Boeing 727 but would carry twice as many passengers.

Cash for such moves could come from authorization by the Lockheed board this week for filing a registration with the SEC covering a proposed sale of $125-million in convertible debentures.

Lockheed, with 90,000 employees in 11 operating divisions, topped $2-billion in sales in 1966; profits, as yet unannounced, will likely be close to last year's $51.5-million.

LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

March 1, 1967

ANALYSIS OF CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1967 (Senate No. S.1026)

The Administration's 1967 civil rights bill (S.1026) covers the same general areas of concern as that of 1966 (H.R.14765) with the exception of Title III. In last year's bill that title would have granted to the Attorney General the right to institute suits to desegregate public schools and public facilities. Title III of this year's bill is an amendment to Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It would give to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission authority to issue cease and desist orders enforceable in the federal courts. This year's bill has an additional title - VI - to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission.

There are a few significant changes from the 1966 bill in Title IV, the housing title, and Title V, protection for civil rights. The differences in the jury titles, I and II, appear to be technical and less than major.

Reference in this memorandum to H.R.14765 will be to the bill that passed the House and was filibustered in the Senate in 1966.

TITLE I - FEDERAL JURY REFORM

The first title regulates the selection of federal juries. It prohibits discrimination in selection on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, national origin or economic status. It establishes a method of selecting juries on a random, representative basis. The basic source of jury lists will be voting lists, except that where such lists are not representative, the judicial council of the circuit can require the use of additional sources. Parties to a suit may require the production of evidence by the jury commissioner to determine whether the provisions of this title are being complied with. The only disqualifying factors for jury selection would be failure to meet citizenship, age or residence requirements, illiteracy, incapacitating mental or physical infirmity or conviction of a crime punishable by more than one year's imprisonment.

TITLE II - STATE JURY REFORM

Title II prohibits any distinction because of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, or economic status in the selection of state juries. The prohibition could be enforced through civil action brought by the Attorney General, a private person suffering discrimination, or by a litigant in a criminal or civil case. In any such case, the title provides discovery procedures under which it would be determined how juries are selected. If the court finds probable cause to believe that discrimination occurred and that the records are insufficient to permit a determination, the burden is shifted to the state to show non-discrimination. Relevant jury records must be kept for a specified time, and would be subject to production and inspection. When a court finds discrimination, it is authorized to fashion appropriate relief, including: suspension or prohibition of discriminatory qualifications, or ones that are so subjective as to permit abuse; requiring use of objective criteria; and appointment of a master to perform the duties of the jury commissioner.

TITLE III - EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

Title III would amend Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to strengthen the authority of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Under this title the Commission would have subpoena power to assist in its investigation of charges of discrimination. It could conduct hearings on such charges. Upon a finding of discrimination, it could issue cease and desist orders enforceable in the federal courts. Such orders could include a requirement of affirmative action, including an award of back pay. Before conducting a hearing, the Commission would be required to attempt to affect a settlement by conciliation.

The title would continue in effect the requirement that cases must be referred for a limited time to state and local governments having enforceable FEP laws. The Commission would be authorized, but not required, to surrender complete jurisdiction in employment cases to such governments.

Individuals who do not receive satisfaction from the Commission would be authorized to file civil suits for redress, and the authority of the Attorney General to file suits against patterns or practices of discrimination would not be affected.

Persons aggrieved and "other persons" may intervene in a hearing at the discretion of the Commission, and "any interested person" may intervene in the enforcement proceedings in the discretion of the court. Aggrieved persons may obtain review of any final order of the Commission.

TITLE IV - HOUSING DISCRIMINATION

This title would prohibit discrimination because of race, color, religion or national origin in the purchase, rental, financing or occupancy of any housing (with the single exception of housing sponsored by religious organizations for their members).

This total coverage would be reached in stages. Immediately on passage of the bill, all housing now covered by the existing executive order would be affected. In 1968 all housing not owner-occupied and all housing of five or more units would be added; this would add many apartments and all new housing. Beginning with 1969 coverage would include the total housing market.

The chief means of enforcement would be by administrative action conducted by the Department of HUD. The Secretary would be authorized to receive and investigate complaints, to conduct hearings and to issue court-enforceable cease and desist orders, including orders for $50 a day penalties for failure to obey initial orders. He would have subpoena power to support investigations and hearings. Before issuing a complaint, he would be required to try to affect a settlement by conciliation.

Aggrieved persons who do not obtain satisfaction through the administrative procedure may file civil action to enforce rights protected by this title. The Attorney General could file suits against patterns and practices of discrimination.

The Secretary may cooperate with, and delegate duities to, state housing agencies, including the full enforcement of provisions of this title.

The title includes an "anti-block busting" provision, and one that would prevent real estate organizations from discriminating in admission practices.

To assist him in enforcement of the title, the bill provides for an additional assistant secretary for the Department of HUD.

TITLE V - INTERFERENCE WITH CIVIL RIGHTS

Title V would make it a federal criminal offense to interfere with specified civil rights because of the victim's race, color, religion or national origin. The rights so protected are voting, running for public office, serving as a poll watcher, enrolling in or attending a public school or college, participating in or enjoying any federal or state benefit or program, seeking or engaging in employment, engaging in housing activities, serving as a juror, using any common carrier, enjoying any benefit assisted by federal funds and using any place of public accommodation.

Also prohibited is interference with anyone to discourage a person from enjoying such rights or for having assisted another to do so.

Penalties could be up to life imprisonment, where death occurs. Existing civil rights laws are amended to provide similar penalties.

Persons aggrieved would also be given the right to sue for preventive relief or for damages.

The "anti-riot" provision adopted in the House last year is not included.

TITLE VI - CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Under this title the life of the Civil Rights Commission would be extended for five additional years beyond its present termination date--January 31, 1968.

THE LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Education

Shel Hershorn from Blackstar

Dr. James B. Conant, left, has undertaken a major examination of education programs in the United States in the last 10 years. Some of his publications are shown above.

Conant: A New Report By the Schools' Mr. Fixit

By FRED M. HECHINGER

In 1957, just as the first Soviet Sputnik led to alarmed questioning about the American schools' intellectual stamina, the Carnegie Corporation commissioned James Bryant Conant to launch a one-man review of the high schools. Two years later, the first Conant report, "The American High School Today," was published.

It quickly became a household word in school-conscious communities. Its 21 recommendations were rattled off much in the fashion of an airline pilot's checklist to assure a safe flight.

Last week Dr. Conant, now 73 and anxious to shed the mantle of the public schools' Dr. Fixit, offered a reappraisal in a new book, "The Comprehensive High School: A Second Report to Interested Citizens." His new report showed significant improvements along with much unfinished business.

The crux of the original Conant inquiry was his belief that education for a democratic society should depend in large measure on a comprehensive high school to be attended by children of all shadings of ability, background and aspiration. But while he saw this as the prototype of the American school, he was also aware that lack of fiscal as well as intellectual commitment threatened to water down the content and to economize on proper staffing of such schools.

Today, he found, many more schools satisfy some of his demands, but only about 10 per cent of the sample seem to have lived up to the total bill of requirements.

Many schools had received an infusion of academic vigor—more and better science and mathematic instruction, substantial gains in foreign languages and better staffing of English courses. But Dr. Conant also found that a child's educational opportunities are still determined by the accident of where he lives. He found in questionaires sent to 2,000 schools that 75 per cent were still improperly staffed for English instruction.

The reason for such inequalities, Dr. Conant said, is the "chaotic" state of financing, with some communities lagging dangerously behind others, and with some states contributing the lion's share and others less than 10 per cent.

Dr. Conant, after 20 years as president of Harvard University and a three-year stint as U. S. Ambassador to West Germany, took on the school reform assignment in 1957. In rapid succession, he published six books which, as even his critics admit, have been of unequaled impact. More than half a million copies of these books have been sold. All royalties were plowed back into the research.

What was the story of this remarkable mission?

Immediately after publication of "The American High School Today," Dr. Conant took his 21 recommendations to the American people with the fervor of Woodrow Wilson's crusade for the League of Nations. He traveled across the country, ate lukewarm chicken dinners in an endless succession of high school cafeterias, addressed packed auditoriums, permitted himself to be buttonholed by thousands of P.T.A. members, taped hundreds of interviews conducted by disk jockeys who had barely read the report's jacket, shook hands in receiving lines that stretched across the continent.

Some critics ridiculed his do-it-yourself school improvement approach. But the simplicity of his prescriptions gave thousands of citizens the courage to demand an educational New Deal.

They could understand his demand that academically talented youngsters should get at least four years each of high school English, mathematics and one foreign language, plus three years each of science and social studies.

They understood, too, the suggestion that English teachers responsible for more than 100 pupils could not possibly take the task of composition—assigning and correcting—seriously.

American egalitarianism readily accepted Dr. Conant's preference for the comprehensive high school—with academic, vocational and business students under one roof, in contrast to the European model which freezes careers and futures at an early age.

Considering the low state of academic offerings in the pre-Sputnik schools, the early success of the Conant reform drive was dramatic.

"Don't say it was all Conant," he said last week. "Undoubtedly I was riding a tide."

But after modestly putting the early victories in perspective, Dr. Conant replied to those of his critics who consider him too pragmatic and conventional.

"They charge I only took the best things I found were already being done and turned them into my recommendations," he said. "That's quite true, and I don't apologize for it."

From the high schools, Dr. Conant turned briefly to the junior highs and, in a pamphlet, condemned their preoccupation with marching bands and imitation varsity teams.

In 1961, he published "Slums and Suburbs." For the first time the reserved, understating New England scientist and university administrator appeared moved by anger. He had seen the underprivileged slums and the prestige-obsessed overprivileged suburbs. The sight offended his sense of justice as much as his ideology.

Ironically, he briefly infuriated some civil rights leaders because he placed less stress on school integration than on the reform of housing and employment patterns. He demanded that ghetto children be taught "marketable skills," and was accused of wanting to create an army of shoeshine boys, when he actually considered as "marketable" any vocation or profession that could absorb those youngsters. (The Conant priorities of education-plus-employment have since become more widely accepted.)

Most important, Dr. Conant dramatized the threat of an army of "out-of-school and out-of-work" youths in the Negro slums. He called it "social dynamite." Soon the dynamite was to explode in tragic riots.

In 1963 Dr. Conant published what was to become his most controversial report, "The Education of American Teachers." It was a blistering attack on the teacher-training establishment, the low quality of education courses, the often irrelevant criteria used to certify teachers.

He asked for carefully supervised internship and a period of on-the-job probationary residency—obviously borrowed from the medical arsenal.

The education Establishment shuddered and gave the proposals the silent treatment. Only a few daring institutions and educational leaders volunteered to test the proposals. The returns have not yet come in.

In 1964 Dr. Conant moved on to the reform of the Establishment itself. In "Shaping Educational Policies," he asked for a housecleaning to improve the quality of the state education authorities so that they could be given greater power. First, their professional competence and political decontamination had to be assured. (Almost half of all state education commissioners continue to be politically elected, and many, Dr. Conant said, bring with them an entourage of political hacks rather than educational leaders.)

Since more money would have to come from Washington, he called on the states to gather strength to initiate policies rather than abdicate to the Federal Government. After another whirlwind campaign of political persuasion, supported by former Gov. Terry Sanford of North Carolina, Dr. Conant nursed into life the first educational "compact" of a number of the most populous states.

Between these pragmatic books, Dr. Conant found time to write a philosophical volume, "The Child, the Parent and the State." His theme was that this country must seek middle ground between the extremes of the totalitarian view of the individual as the creature of the state and the permissive concept of the individual as responsible only to his personal happiness.

At the end of this remarkable 10-year effort, Dr. Conant, though pleased to find many schools improved, is deeply troubled by their persistent inequalities. Perhaps by relying too heavily on the opinions of the local school administrators, he placed too much of the blame on chaotic financing, and too little on lack of educational initiative.

Yet, there is little doubt that from a local autonomy akin to isolationism the trend is shifting to greater support and leadership by the state and national levels of government and education.

The money, warns Dr. Conant, must increasingly come from Washington, to be disbursed by the states. Yet, unless the states are to replace ill-financed chaos with gold-plated chaos, his earlier proposals for the reform of the educational Establishment will have to be implemented first.

Support From Gardner

Fortunately, Dr. Conant has allies in high places. A week ago, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare John W. Gardner said: "The old system of weak state and local government . . . is dead. . . . If we can devise of pattern i Federal-state-local relations that provides a new solution to the old problems of centralism vs. pluralism . . . we will have contributed importantly to the art of governing a free society."

Of this new coalition Dr. Conant now demands the right of every talented youngster to study calculus, or French, or physics, or well-taught history and English, art and music, no matter where he goes to school. He is not satisfied that his first crusade has brought these opportunities to millions of students. To those who chide critics of the schools for calling the glass part empty rather than three-quarters full he appears to reply that a thirsty youngster derives no benefit from the empty quarter.

THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM

In his education message, President Johnson last week called for continuation of existing Federal aid programs, especially for the upgrading of schools with large numbers of underprivileged children. But he also urged an improvement of the leadership of local and state school authorities. In thinly disguised criticism, he suggested that in its present state the leadership is not equal to the task of long-range planning that the new influx of Federal dollars requires. Conceding that the job cannot be done without dollars, he warned, nevertheless, that "dollars alone cannot do the job."

The President also recommended to Congress:

Creation of a Corporation for Public Television that could channel public and private funds into noncommercial, including educational, TV;

Expansion of the National Teacher Corps from 1,200 to 5,500 members;

A study of the potential of educational technology, such as computers and television;

Coordination and expansion of existing programs for the training of teachers, school administrators and teacher aides;

Aid to states and communities to end racial segregation in schools.

Mr. Johnson also pleaded with Congress to put education appropriations at the head of the list of legislative action to enable schools to plan their programs without having to guess and to keep their fingers crossed about Washington's contributions.

80-Day Injunction Sought:

T-H Law Invoked In Shipyard Dispute

Pres. Johnson ordered the Justice Dept. to seek an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction sending back to work 1,300 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, on strike since Nov. 4 against 13 West Coast shipyards.

The President instructed the attorney general to seek the injunction in the U.S. District Court in San Francisco on the basis of an emergency board report on the issues in dispute, and an affidavit by Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara that the strike was causing delays in the Viet Nam sea lift.

Board members were: Chairman J. Keith Mann, of the Stanford University law school; Pres. George E. Reedy, Jr., of the Struthers Research & Development Corp., former White House press secretary, and Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney.

An IBEW spokesman, disputing government claims that the strike imperils the national health and safety, said an injunction would only prolong the dispute for 80 days. He said union members nevertheless would obey a court order if one is issued at the President's request.

The union protested to the board that the shipyard strikers could not return to their jobs under contract terms formerly existing, as required in the usual injunction process, since the IBEW is striking for a first contract. The board referred the question to Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, which assigned Willoughby Abner, special assistant to the service's director, to meet with IBEW negotiators on the issue.

Some 400 of the strikers are working temporarily at "independent" shipyards whose operators have settled with the IBEW for a 57-cent hourly package of improvements but 900 others have been largely unemployed since the walkout began.

The union has signed up many independent operators but has been unable to get the major yards, represented in bargaining by the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association, to meet the strikers' minimum settlement terms, said a spokesman for IBEW Vice Pres. W. L. Vinson.

Association members have offered to settle for a pact providing wage hikes of 10 cents an hour for each of three years, plus welfare improvements.

Wages of shipyard electricians are "far below" those paid by non-shipyard employers, said the union. Navy shipyards are paying IBEW members 29 cents an hour more than private yards—a rate based on area wage standards, according to the same source.

"We want a coastwide agreement with the association based on today's prices, not those of 20 months ago," when other unions reached contract agreement, the IBEW said.

Charging that the intent of Taft-Hartley is "to put the weight of federal government pressure behind the employer," the union said the emergency procedures of the act were being invoked just as the strike was becoming effective.

Meany Urges Labor Support For Red Cross

The Red Cross "merits our support as citizens and trade unionists," AFL-CIO Pres. Meany declared in a special report on the agency's activities and needs to the top officers of affiliated unions.

Meany is a member of the ARC board of governors and is vice chairman for labor for the 1967 Red Cross campaign for members and funds.

Total needs for the year, the report shows, are estimated at $118.8 million, the highest since World War II. Included is $47.4 million for services to the armed forces, veterans and their families, an increase of $8.4 million over the previous year because of expanded work in Viet Nam.

The first aid program, through which increasing numbers of union members are being trained, is earmarked for $6.7 million; the

St. John's Teachers Get Arbitration Bid

New York—Trustees of St. John's University have offered to arbitrate a dispute over the firing in December 1965 of 29 faculty members. The offer was announced by the university president at a press conference.

Pres. Israel Kugler of AFT College Teachers Local 1460, with 200 members on strike for more than a year in support of the fired teachers, called a week-end meeting to discuss the offer. A union spokesman called the proposal an encouraging "breakthrough" but said it was directed to individual teachers and not the union.

State Job Service Hit For Rights Act Failures

Ohio's state employment service faces a possible cutoff of federal funds for failure to comply with the Civil Rights Act and with Labor Dept. non-discrimination regulations.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley H. Ruttenberg announced that he has recommended "appropriate action" against the Ohio agency to that the strike was causing delays in the Viet Nam sea lift.

Board members were: Chairman J. Keith Mann, of the Stanford University law school; Pres. George E. Reedy, Jr., of the Struthers Research & Development Corp., former White House press secretary, and Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., attorney.

An IBEW spokesman, disputing government claims that the strike imperils the national health and safety, said an injunction would only prolong the dispute for 80 days. He said union members nevertheless would obey a court order if one is issued at the President's request.

The union protested to the board that the shipyard strikers could not return to their jobs under contract terms formerly existing, as required in the usual injunction process, since the IBEW is striking for a first contract. The board referred the question to Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, which assigned Willoughby Abner, special assistant to the service's director, to meet with IBEW negotiators on the issue.

Some 400 of the strikers are working temporarily at "independent" shipyards whose operators have signed.

Ohio's state employment service faces a possible cutoff of federal funds for failure to comply with the Civil Rights Act and with Labor Dept. non-discrimination regulations.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley H. Ruttenberg announced that he has recommended "appropriate action" against the Ohio agency to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. One possible action would be withdrawal of federal funds under Title VI of the civil rights law.

Ruttenberg said Labor Dept. investigations indicated that the Ohio Bureau of Unemployment Compensation:

- Made "no significant, purposive, or effective effort to ensure against its servicing employers who discriminate in their hiring practices on the basis of race."
- Continued "to consistently fill job orders from employers who restrict the hiring of Negroes to particular, usually menial, occupations—for example, the hiring by restaurants of Negroes for kitchen jobs but not as waitresses."
- Violated government recordkeeping requirements.
- Coerced "state employes to disclose statements made by them in the course of the investigation."

The Labor Dept. released copies of correspondence over several months between Ruttenberg and Willard P. Dudley, administrator of the Ohio agency.

Ruttenberg detailed the corrective actions he thought the agency should take to make sure that the employers it services are following non-discrimination standards in hiring.

Dudley replied in effect that his agency was doing the best it could, disagreed with some of the Labor Dept. allegations and didn't have the staff to permit "100 percent compliance" with Ruttenberg's suggestions.

This reply was rejected by Ruttenberg as lacking "adequate and clear assurances" that corrective actions will be taken.

AFL-CIO members give most of their contributions to the Red Cross through united appeals. However, some 1,800 of the 3,000 Red Cross chapters raise their funds in campaigns during March. Other chapters conduct educational and recruitment drives during the month, and seek blood donors and students for first aid programs.

LPIU Negotiates Fund For Early Retirements

An employer-financed plan providing for early retirement of members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers has been formally established by a 12-man joint union-employer board of trustees.

The LPIU Early Retirement Fund will make it possible for a covered member to retire at age 60 with the equivalent of full social security benefits which will continue until age 65, when he will receive retirement benefits from the government and from pension plans negotiated by the union.

The trustees announced that more than 21 percent of the LPIU's 52,000 members are now covered by bargaining agreements making them eligible for early retirement.

The union's objective, it said, is to make it possible in the next decade for a member to retire at age 60 and to receive up to 40 percent of his earnings to the age of 65.

LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown described the plan as one that "dovetails into our whole union approach for creating job security in a time of rapid technological development in our industry."

The plan was first negotiated in Chicago and Philadelphia and 10 additional locals have since won coverage in negotiations.

The plan is entirely financed by employers beginning with a one percent contribution of straight time earnings in the first year and growing to three per cent in the third year. The plan initially will have 12 trustees, six from the union and six from management.

Kugler said the union's latest offer to settle the dispute was rejected recently by the current university president, the Very Rev. Joseph T. Cahill of the Vincentian Fathers. The university has refused to recognize the union or meet with its leaders, one of whom is the Rev. Peter O'Reilly, a former St. John's teacher.

Sound Service Aides Win Raise

New York—Sound service engineers in movie theaters throughout the United States get wage increases totaling $10 a week in two steps under a new contract negotiated by the Theatrical Stage Employes and the two major service companies, Altec and RCA.

The first step of $6 is retroactive to Jan. 2, and the remaining $4 is effective on Jan. 2, 1968, when the top straight-time salary becomes $190.43 a week. Meal allowances in connection with overtime were hiked from $1.50 to $2.

GM Ordered To Bargain on Subcontracts

A three-judge U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington has ruled that General Motors Corp. must negotiate with the Auto Workers on subcontracting of work which has the effect of reducing the number of jobs held by UAW members.

The court unanimously overturned a National Labor Relations Board ruling in favor of General Motors.

GM had hired an outside firm to take over an operation at its South Gate, Calif., plant. The court said this took away the jobs of six UAW members.

"Though these men got similar jobs elsewhere in the plant, the change had an adverse impact on the bargaining unit since it diminished by six the number of jobs performed by its members," the decision said.

General Motors had refused to bargain on the subcontracting issue. It claimed in court that the so-called "management rights" clause in its union contract gave it the authority to revise operations at the factory.

A company spokesman said GM is considering a further appeal of the court ruling.

Make Old Age a Promise, Not a Peril...

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany testified before the House Ways & Means Committee in support of the Administration's social security bill, which has been introduced by Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.). Following are excerpts from his testimony:

IT SEEMS TO US that H.R. 5710 offers a wide range of badly-needed improvements in social security benefits; and it offers a sound and equitable program for financing.

We can all agree, I think, that the benefit increases are long overdue. We can all agree, as well, on the reason for the delay. Over the last several years, the major objective of those who are deeply interested in social security was its extension to include medicare.

Now the time has come to return to fundamentals—the basic social security benefits.

Pres. Johnson has made a number of excellent proposals, which are incorporated into the bill. We believe the President's proposals are a long step toward the kind of social security system the American people should have.

This is most apparent when we consider the retirees—the elderly, who depend upon social security pensions for their support.

It is true, and it ought to be emphasized more strongly, that social security is not just an old folk's program.

It protects the widows and children of breadwinners who die. It protects the younger worker who is disabled, and those who have depended upon his earnings. These are vitally important safeguards that are too often overlooked, especially by the younger generation of workers, who need them most.

But the great majority of the 22 million Americans now dependent upon social security are elderly retirees. So let us look at their plight. It is a grim story.

THE AVERAGE monthly social security benefit for a single retired worker is about $84 a month—about $20 a week. The average benefit for a retired couple is about $144 a month or about $33.50 a week. For 2.5 million widows the average is only about $74 a month.

For millions of Americans these benefits, inadequate as they are, spell the difference between grinding poverty and at least subsistence living. Only 25 percent of the aged who now get social security benefits would be above the poverty level without them. In 1965, social security benefits lifted 5.5 million, or 38 percent of the aged, out of poverty; but they left 5 million, or 35 percent, below the poverty line.

What poverty line am I talking about? I mean the Best Buy

In contrast, the Dept. of Labor budget for a minimum but adequate living for an elderly retired couple is about $3,000 a year in a large city and $2,500 in a smaller one. But even this is pitiful when you see what it provides. For example, it allows only about a half pound of meat and less than two eggs a day (and that's for two people); three dresses a year (including house dresses) for the wife; the man can replace his topcoat every ninth year.

For another comparison, let's look at the minimum wage. The $1.40 minimum wage which went into effect last month gives a full-time, year-round worker about $2,800. Next year he'll get $3,200 when the minimum goes to $1.60. Even this year, the worker at the minimum gets nearly three times the average social security benefit of a single retired worker and 60 percent more than a retired couple. Yet he's at the bottom of the scale; less than 15 percent of all workers get no more than the federal minimum wage.

During the 12 years from 1955 to 1966, inclusive, 90 percent of those who are now on the social security rolls began to draw their benefits. So when we use these

WE HAVE REFERRED to the erosion of social security benefits by rising prices. We in the AFL-CIO would favor some suitable arrangement for preventing this erosion. We believe that such a provision could be included in the program without any additional financing. The Federal Employees Retirement System and the military retirement system already contain provisions that adjust benefits automatically in accordance with increases in the Consumer Price Index. We see no reason why social security beneficiaries should receive any less.

Introduction of a cost-of-living mechanism in the social security system would be a forward step, but we would emphasize that this alone does not guarantee benefits.

Social security beneficiaries have a right not just to keep from falling behind in the race with living costs but to participate in the nation's increased standard of living. Therefore, Congress should give consideration to effective means of keeping social security benefit levels in line with other incomes. One way to do this would be to provide for periodic adjustment at fairly frequent intervals of benefit levels to some appropriate measure of active workers' earnings.

ON THE WHOLE, we are most enthusiastic about the proposed increases in minimum benefits. Those at the minimum are the poorest of the poor, and they are therefore a shockingly large group. For example, of the million-plus new social security beneficiaries in 1964, 16 per cent were at the minimum. Some 2.5 million individuals now receive the minimum of $44 a month.

Farm workers, who are among the lowest paid workers in the nation, make up a large proportion of this minimum benefit group.

Though the purpose of a social security system is broader than the elimination of poverty, it can be used for this purpose to a much greater extent than in the past. Increasing the minimum benefits would be a major blow against poverty among the aged. We also endorse the higher minimum for those with long histories of contributions, so that the 25-year worker would get no less than $100 a month.

The increase of at least 15 percent for most beneficiaries would represent considerable progress, but we urge that this be only a first step toward the 50 percent goal I have stated.

As you well know, higher benefits must be paid for, one way or another.

The AFL-CIO has long felt that substantial benefit the kind of social security system the American people should have.

This is most apparent when we consider the retirees—the elderly, who depend upon social security pensions for their support.

It is true, and it ought to be emphasized more strongly, that social security is not just an old folk's program.

It protects the widows and children of breadwinners who die. It protects the younger worker who is disabled, and those who have depended upon his earnings. These are vitally important safeguards that are too often overlooked, especially by the younger generation of workers, who need them most.

In 1965, social security benefits lifted 5.5 million, or 38 percent of the aged, out of poverty; but they left 5 million, or 35 percent, below the poverty line.

What poverty line am I talking about? I mean the Social Security Administration's definition of poverty. According to that definition, a single worker isn't poor if he has an income of $1,500 a year. A couple isn't poor if they have $1,900 a year coming in. It seems to me that this is about as poor as you can get.

Now I understand that this poverty level is based on a Dept. of Agriculture "economy food plan," intended for "temporary or emergency use when funds are low." That "economy food plan" allows 22 cents a meal for each person. Imagine that—22 cents. And since they came up with this figure, living costs have risen over 5 percent. So the social security poverty standard today isn't even enough for a "temporary or emergency" period. Yet for millions, it is not temporary; it is permanent.

'It's in Everybody's Future'

In contrast, the Dept. of Labor budget for a minimum but adequate living for an elderly retired couple is about $3,000 a year in a large city and $2,500 in a smaller one. But even this is pitiful when you see what it provides. For example, it allows only about a half pound of meat and less than two eggs a day (and that's for two people); three dresses a year (including house dresses) for the wife; the man can replace his topcoat every ninth year.

During the 12 years from 1955 to 1966, inclusive, 90 percent of those who are now on the social security rolls began to draw their benefits. So when we use these 12 years as a base, we are including practically everyone who is now on the receiving end.

There have been two increases in social security cash benefits over these 12 years. There was a 7.5 percent increase in 1958 and a 7 percent increase in 1965.

But neither of these increases—or both of them together—kept pace with the cost of living, much less the general standard of living. The figures are beyond dispute.

And, of course, we are not concerned just with the purely arithmetical calculation, we are concerned with the broader principle that older Americans are entitled to do better than just keep pace with the cost of living in a society when the standard of living is steadily rising. The American standard of living has gone up almost 50 percent since 1954. Surely all of us have an obligation to do more for older people than merely to hold them at a static—and extremely low—level of living. Who is better entitled to share in the increased standard of living than our senior citizens, who did so much to make it possible?

Consider this contrast. Average wages have risen more than 55 percent since December 1954. That average beneficiary with $66.60 a month in 1954 and $76 now, would need 36.5 percent, or $103.76, to keep pace with average wages. The 1959 retiree now receiving $95.30 would need 18 percent more.

One of the bills this committee is considering provides for an increase in social security benefits of only 8 percent. Its inadequacy is appalling.

In contrast, the average 20 percent increase in social security benefits recommended by the President would have real significance. They would enable the elderly and others dependent on social security to begin to share in the fruits of the nation's economic advance. I said "begin to share," and that's what I mean. The AFL-CIO Convention in December 1965, and the AFL-CIO Executive Council last month pointed out that a fully adequate level of social security payments would require a boost of at least 50 percent in present payments. But we regard, and we hope the Congress will regard, the proposed 20 percent increase in benefits this year as a substantial down payment toward that goal.

to effective means of keeping social security benefit levels in line with other incomes. One way to do this would be to provide for periodic adjustment at fairly frequent intervals of benefit levels to some appropriate measure of active workers' earnings.

As you well know, higher benefits must be paid for, one way or another.

The AFL-CIO has long felt that substantial benefit increases should be partially financed by raising the earnings base on which both contributions and benefits are determined. From the inception of the social security program, contributions have not been paid on all the earnings of workers, but in the early days they were paid on a very large proportion. The original $3,000 wage base covered 95 per cent of all taxable earnings. It is true that Congress has raised the wage base from time to time, but neither fast enough nor far enough.

This lag violates a cardinal principle of the American social insurance system of relating benefits to wages, and thus maintaining, to the greatest possible degree, established pre-retirement living standards. I might add that it also weakens the appeal of the social security concept to the younger, well-paid worker.

The Administration bill would increase the wage base in three steps to $10,800 by 1974. This is a long step toward what we believe is the proper goal—at present income levels—of $15,000.

The bill would also raise the contribution rate from 4.4 percent in 1969 to 4.5 percent, and change the present eventual maximum of 4.85 percent to 5 percent (excluding the medicare tax).

AFL-CIO MEMBERS are properly known for their willingness to pay for what they get, in war and peace. I am completely confident that they will gladly pay their share toward a better social security system.

even its enactment will leave gaps that will need to be filled in the near future.

FOR INSTANCE, our members are increasingly faced with the hardships of enforced early retirement. We understand that more than half the men who apply for social security benefits do so before age 65. This means that their benefits are computed on an actuarially reduced basis, and this reduction is substantial.

We believe a flexible zone of retirement between 60 and 65 could be incorporated in the social security law—one that would permit retirement at age 60 with less than full actuarial reduction, and would allow older workers to draw disability benefits if their disability prevents them from doing their usual work —provided of course, such changes were accompanied by a substantial increase in benefits.

We would also like to see improvements in the basic disability insurance provisions. Disability benefits are not paid unless total disability lasts six months and only if the disability is expected to result in death or last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months. This long waiting period means that large numbers of workers, though disabled for extended periods of time, are without either earnings or benefits just at the time when their expenses are highest. The disability provisions should be changed to allow benefits after a shorter period of total disability—as a first step, three months, but eventually, one month—and without regard to the expected duration of the disability.

This year's gains should be regarded only as a down-payment toward a much better Social Security system in the future.

NOW LET US TURN to a related field, also covered in the bill—public welfare.

Most poor people—78 percent, in fact—get no public assistance whatever. And again I am referring to those who are "poor" by the Social Security Administration's definition, which, to me sounds more like destitution.

The main reason why so few people get public assistance is that less than half of the poor fall into the four narrow, artificial categories that now prevail: the needy aged, the blind, the permanently and totally disabled and certain needy families with dehouse rule" be immediately eliminated wherever it is in effect.

Adult recipients of these family benefits often lose welfare payments dollar-for-dollar, because of the money they earn when they are able to find work. This is a senseless penalty which destroys employment incentives. As the bill recognizes, earnings should be permitted up to some reasonable amount before welfare payments are reduced.

WE WARMLY SUPPORT the provision in the bill for temporary assistance to migratory workers and to others who come into a state seeking employment, who are ineligible for public assistance because of state residence requirements.

social security concept to the younger, well-paid worker.

The Administration bill would increase the wage base in three steps to $10,800 by 1974. This is a long step toward what we believe is the proper goal—at present income levels—of $15,000.

The bill would also raise the contribution rate from 4.4 percent in 1969 to 4.5 percent, and change the present eventual maximum of 4.85 percent to 5 percent (excluding the medicare tax).

AFL-CIO MEMBERS are properly known for their willingness to pay for what they get, in war and peace. I am completely confident that they will gladly pay their share toward a better social security system.

But in all candor I think you should know that in time, we shall urge a modest and gradual contribution to the social security trust fund from the general revenues of the United States. We believe that would be an effective way—and a simple one—to introduce the principle of progressive taxation to the social security system. We are not asking for this now, so I will not argue the case for it. But we will be back.

Now let me deal briefly with the proposal to raise the allowable earnings of social security beneficiaries. In one sense we are sympathetic, since those who have unearned income don't have to count it at all. But on balance we are against the idea. If people who can support themselves draw social security benefits, there will be less money for those who can't. What is proposed in the bill is no cause for alarm, but we would oppose any drastic rise in the earnings allowance.

NOW AS TO MEDICARE. The AFL-CIO supports the provision in the bill for extending medicare coverage to the disabled. All the reasons for providing health insurance coverage for the aged apply equally to those who are disabled. They are a high-cost, high-risk group, living on reduced incomes. At the very time they experience a drastic reduction in income, they are faced with medical and hospital care expenditures far in excess of those confronting the rest of the population. The increase in the earnings base provided in the bill, which applies to medicare as well as the basic social security contributions, would more than meet the additional cost involved.

There have been many complaints from older workers concerning the financial problems posed by prescription drugs and eye examinations. The AFL-CIO feels that the cost of these items, so essential to the health of the elderly, should be covered within the medicare program.

Doctors who insist on direct billing are also causing problems for medicare patients. Many retirees are required to raise substantial amounts of money, often thousands of dollars, to pay a doctor so they can have a receipted bill to secure reimbursement. Even though the retiree will eventually be paid in full or in part, the interval causes resentment at best and hardship at worst.

We say the direct billing method is wrong and the assignment method should be the sole procedure for paying doctor bills. This would relieve medicare patients of the burden of raising large amounts of cash prior to reimbursement by the intermediary and would protect them from unreasonably high charges by doctors.

This is a forward-looking bill which would make substantial improvements in the social security system. But disability insurance provisions. Disability benefits are not paid unless total disability lasts six months and only if the disability is expected to result in death or last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months. This long waiting period means that large numbers of workers, though disabled for extended periods of time, are without either earnings or benefits just at the time when their expenses are highest. The disability provisions should be changed to allow benefits after a shorter period of total disability—as a first step, three months, but eventually, one month—and without regard to the expected duration of the disability.

This year's gains should be regarded only as a downpayment toward a much better Social Security system in the future.

NOW LET US TURN to a related field, also covered in the bill—public welfare.

Most poor people—78 percent, in fact—get no public assistance whatever. And again I am referring to those who are "poor" by the Social Security Administration's definition, which, to me sounds more like destitution.

The main reason why so few people get public assistance is that less than half of the poor fall into the four narrow, artificial categories that now prevail: the needy aged, the blind, the permanently and totally disabled and certain needy families with dependent children. These are the categories for which federal matching grants for public assistance are available.

Besides the limited categories, there are other reasons why public assistance helps only a small fraction of the poor. Some states lack the money—or the will—to participate in all the available federal programs. Some states impose limitations and restrictions not required by federal law. And assistance standards in some states are so low that they exclude many persons who are below the state's own minimum needs standard and far below the poverty level—any sort of poverty level.

The President has recommended, and the bill requires, the states to raise cash payment to welfare recipients to the level the state itself sets as the minimum for subsistence; and it requires the states to bring these minimum standards up to date annually. We endorse this proposal.

We also support the bill's extension of aid to families with dependent children. But we strongly urge that this program, now voluntarily with the states, be made mandatory, and that the so-called "man in the house rule" be immediately eliminated wherever it is in effect.

'I Did My Part'

Adult recipients of these family benefits often lose welfare payments dollar-for-dollar, because of the money they earn when they are able to find work. This is a senseless penalty which destroys employment incentives. As the bill recognizes, earnings should be permitted up to some reasonable amount before welfare payments are reduced.

WE WARMLY SUPPORT the provision in the bill for temporary assistance to migratory workers and to others who come into a state seeking employment, who are ineligible for public assistance because of state residence requirements.

Other improvements are needed. Minimum standards should be required in housing occupied by public welfare recipients, the rents of which are paid from public funds. Public welfare should stop subsidizing slum housing.

Aid to the permanently and totally disabled should be extended to the relatively short-term disabled, recognizing partial disability which is seriously incapacitating and eliminating the present minimum age of 18.

Detailed investigations of public assistance applicants and recipients are essentially demeaning. They should be replaced by less costly and more democratic methods of determining eligibility. These should be consistent with constitutional and statutory rights, and should not violate the privacy or dignity of individuals seeking assistance.

Child welfare programs should be extended and improved. Better services are needed for the care and protection of children, including foster care, day care and institutional services.

FINALLY, LET ME INCLUDE in the record these paragraphs from the AFL-CIO Executive Council statement adopted on Feb. 20:

"The general objectives of the President's proposals for revision of the tax structure for the elderly are based on the fact that the present structure is both unduly complex and lacking in equity.

"However, we find one major fault in the particular mechanism the Administration has proposed for achieving these objectives. We particularly oppose the aspects of the Administration's recommendations which involve taxation of social security and railroad retirement benefits.

"Social security payments under federal programs have always been tax exempt while the incomes on which contributions to the social insurance funds have been based have been subject to tax. This should continue to be the guiding principle."

The matter at issue is both complex and important.

Social security, in the broadest sense, represents the striving of mankind for a better world; a world in which old age is a promise instead of a peril, in which illness or premature death are personal tragedies rather than family catastrophes.

There is a long way to go before this nation, much less the world, reaches these goals, and the bill before you falls far short of them.

Yet the goals are important. They are important because if we stop striving for them, if we settle for a comfortable version of things as they are, the American spirit will be dead indeed.

I know it is not dead, and, Mr. Chairman, so do you.

The Exceptions

THE EMPLOYER who is willing to scrap his authoritarian—or, at best, paternalistic—role and accept employes as free human beings, with all the dignity that term implies, has the most to gain, and gains the most, from collective bargaining. Recognition of that fact by many employers is a great accomplishment of the National Labor Relations Act.

For our part, we in the labor movement can be proud of our record in observing the onerous restrictions of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts. Seven separate types of "unfair labor practices," some with numerous subdivisions, are forbidden to unions; while employers must follow only five simple mandates. The clear assumption seems to be that unions are more apt to go wrong. Yet in 1966 only 18 percent of all unfair labor practice complaints were issued against labor organizations.

Those who blandly insist that "labor is accepted today"—and they are usually people who want us to roll over and play dead—ought to look at the exceptions.

Let me give you two examples. One arises from a fault in the the law. The other arises from the primitive behavior of a certain kind of corporate management.

The first has to do with agricultural workers. Today the farm worker is encountering all the techniques of jungle warfare from which most workers have long been protected by the Wagner Act. That such circumstances should exist in the wealthiest country in the world—and in some of the richest states of that country—is a national disgrace.

The farm worker does not ask for charity or special privilege. All he seeks is that the national labor policy, applied to all other industries, be applied to him as well. All he asks is that the machinery established by Congress, to resolve labor-management problems and settle any question of representation, be made available to him.

THE SECOND EXAMPLE relates to the continuing, calculated and concerted violation of the National Labor Relations Act by certain employers and groups of employers, including some very large corporations.

This deliberate law-breaking is primarily identified with the South, particularly the southern textile industry. But it can be found in other sections, too.

The behavior of these employers accounts for the fact that nearly two-thirds of the unfair labor practice charges filed against employers in fiscal 1966 involved the discharge of workers for union activity.

This not only indicates a widespread disregard for the law. It also reveals a total lack of humane regard for workers and their families.

I am not talking about the legal resistance of employers to union organization. We think even the legal resistance is short-sighted

What I am talking about is the defiance of law, right down to the perjury level. One remedy would be more adequate penalties on the deliberate law breakers. The NLRB has been moving in this direction, even under the present statute, and we hope it will move farther.

Meanwhile, much could be accomplished if employers who have accepted unionism and collective bargaining would actively and publicly disassociate themselves from those who flout the law.

Executive Council Statement:

Labor Warns Against Retreat In Nation's Battle on Poverty

The following is excerpted from the statement, "The War on Poverty," adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Feb. 26, 1967, at its meeting in Bal Harbour, Fla.

THE AFL-CIO is deeply committed to our nation's efforts to eradicate poverty. When Pres. Johnson first called for "an unconditional war, here and now, on poverty," he struck a deep response from the labor movement. Organized labor, since its birth, has sought to eliminate poverty through trade union organization, collective bargaining, and social legislation.

We have supported, and continue to support, programs aimed at helping the poor move from the hopelessness and despair of poverty toward a sharing of America's general prosperity. The AFL-CIO has long recognized that such programs essentially must be based on:

1. Job opportunities, at decent wages, for the millions of impoverished who are able to work and seek employment.

2. Adequate social security benefits for the aged who are retired.

3. Adequate income maintenance, through a much-improved and overall system of public assistance, for those additional impoverished millions who are not self-sustaining, due to the absence of the family breadwinner, disability or other causes.

The road out of poverty requires full and fair opportunities for education and vocational training, decent housing, effective enforcement of civil rights, and adequate social service assistance. The eventual elimination of poverty, however, must emphasize jobs, income and upgrading as its foundation.

Many essential measures have been enacted by Congress, since 1961, that are parts of the anti-poverty effort—including civil rights legislation, substantial improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act, federal aid to general and vocational education, model cities legislation, and the Economic Opportunity Act. The AFL-CIO was a major force in seeking adoption of all these advances.

The Economic Opportunity Act—with its broad attack on the causes and continuation of poverty—is a vital part of the overall effort to break the poverty cycle.

Organized labor has not only given moral support to this program, but it has been involved at all levels. Today, hundreds of AFL-CIO members serve on community action boards and committees. In addition, AFL-CIO unions have assumed active sponsorship of anti-poverty programs.

Such efforts by organized labor should be expanded in the thousands of communities across the length and breadth of our country—translating AFL-CIO supported national legislation into reality in local communities.

WE REPUDIATE the attacks on the war on poverty aimed at crippling or destroying the entire program. We likewise reject the attempt to erect a mythology that America cannot afford to wage an effective war on poverty.

The AFL-CIO remains convinced that our country has the material resources and human talents to meet both its international requirements and its homefront needs. A retreat now—through a failure to appropriate adequate funds to carry the war on poverty forward—will dash the hopes of those millions of Americans who have yet to rise out of poverty and who are still denied full and equal opportunities.

Recent proposals to involve the business community more directly in the war on poverty, along with others, are highly commendable. The normal functions of business enterprises, as well as the managerial and technical abilities of industry, have their vital and proper roles in the nation's effort to eliminate poverty.

It is our conviction, however, that no segment of our society should seek to profit from the special services it renders to the war on poverty program. We are opposed to the proposal of a federal charter for a profit-making, war-on-poverty company. We view with skepticism and misgiving other proposals for profit-making business ventures in Office of Economic Opportunity and related programs.

A CHANCE FOR HEARINGS ON THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Signs of movement at last! After a month in which the Civil Rights Act of 1967 languished in Committee, Senate sponsors of the bill have engaged in a series of maneuvers designed to get hearings on its provisions.

Back To Judiciary

The six sections have been reintroduced as separate bills. Title I, which would prohibit discrimination in the selection of federal juries and Title II, which would extend similar prohibitions to the selection of juries in state courts have been reintroduced by Sen. Joseph Tydings (D., Md.). Their numbers are respectively, S.1319 and S.1318. Both of these bills have been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose chairman, James O. Eastland (D., Miss.) has shown his customary disposition to bury the omnibus bill.

However, it may be possible to get hearings on these separate sections. Senator Tydings, as chairman of a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee hopes to hold hearings on the federal jury bill and in fact has already begun to hold hearings on other jury reform measures he has introduced. The state jury section may be sent to an uncertain fate, a subcommittee headed by Senator Sam Ervin (D., N.C.).

Title V, of the omnibus bill, which would make any interference with constitutional rights a criminal offense, has been reintroduced by Senator Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), as S.1362 and goes to Judiciary as does S.1359, Title VI, the section that would extend the life of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission for five years beyond its scheduled termination date of January 31, 1968.

Equal Jobs and Equal Housing

The remaining two sections of the bill have been removed from Eastland's grasp. Title IV, the section that would eventually prohibit discrimination in the sale and rental of all housing has been reintroduced as S.1358 by Senator Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and referred to Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Title III, to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is now S.1308 and goes to Labor and Public Welfare. It was introduced by Senator Joseph Clark (D., Pa.).

Chances for Hearings are Improved

Complicated as these actions sound, their net result is a brightened prospect for hearings on different parts of the omnibus bill. (S.1026). After hearings are completed, the next step will be to get one or more of the sections reported out of Committee. Once a section reaches the Senate floor the other parts can be added as amendments and the entire measure reassembled. An alternative would be to attach the omnibus bill as an amendment to a minor measure and get it before the Senate that way.

It is easy to say that but saying it takes little note of the pitfalls that lie between possibilities and accomplishment. The chief drawback we face is a familiar one: apathy in Congress and in the nation.

Urgency is the Key

Last year, when he was addressing the White House Conference on Civil Rights, Roy Wilkins told the delegates that if there was to be any legislation that year they had to remember that "urgency is the key." It still is. Very little will happen unless we convey to our Senators the desperate need for the Civil Rights Act of 1967.

The first session of this 90th Congress is moving slowly. Members have already begun to talk about when they are going to quit. According to the Washington Post (March 24, 1967), shortly before the Easter recess, "Democratic and Republican leaders compared legislative notes and found only one common denominator: they would like to pass all appropriations bills plus a number of priority items and adjourn sine die by August 1." There was talk of a September first adjournment at the latest. The same article says the President's 1967 civil rights recommendations are not among the priority items.

We Must Make the Change

That Congress does not assign a high priority to civil rights is scarcely news. The civil rights bills of 1963 and 1965 were fairly low down on the lists until public indignation compelled Congress to deal with the issues.

Congress will continue to dally with civil rights legislation unless we insist that action be taken. The obligation falls on the groups in the Leadership Conference to organize in 1967 the kind of broad scale national support that brought us the legislative advances of the last few years. Congress responds to a unified demand.

It's Still the Omnibus Bill

The introduction of the six sections of the bill as six separate bills need not confuse anyone. The goal for us is still the total civil rights package, the omnibus bill, S.1026. Mail on the bill is terribly low. Every group in the Conference has to set its own priority list at once, put S.1026 at the top of it, and get members to write urging their Senators to work for early passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1967.

Big Social Security Benefit Boost Badly Needed

President Johnson has proposed to Congress an average boost of 20 percent in Social Security benefits. Organized labor believes this would be "a substantial down payment" on the 50 percent increase that is really needed.

The 50 percent rise was called for by the last AFL-CIO convention, but the delegates acknowledged that it would be "extremely difficult" to get this large an increase through Congress in view of the cost of the Viet Nam war.

Pension benefits were raised in 1958 and again in 1965, but for people dependent on them they are still far below the poverty level. The increases did not even keep up with the rise in the cost of living.

The following questions and answers explain what the increases will do and why they are needed.

1/ ASSUMES THAT RETIRED WORKER AND WIFE ARE AGE 65 OR OVER WHEN BENEFITS START.
2/ MAXIMUM POSSIBLE UNDER PRESENT LAW.

Q. Who would get how much of the proposed 20 percent Social Security increase?

A. Every retirement benefit would be raised at least 15%. The biggest proportionate increases would go to the 2½ million retirees who now get only the minimum of $44 a month ($66 for a couple). These minimums would become $70 and $105. Also, the minimums for retirees who were covered for 25 years or more of their working lives would rise to $100 for an individual and $150 for a couple.

The special benefits for persons 72 or older who never qualified for Social Security pensions — a provision adopted along with medicare in 1965 — would be $50 rather than $35 a month ($75 instead of $52.50 for a strikes. A worker who was disabled at an early age could draw as much as $78,000 to support his family, even at present benefit rates.

Then there's protection for your survivors. A widow with two small children could collect more than $65,000 — again, at present levels.

Q. It looks to me like I'll be paying 5% of everything I earn. Couldn't I buy myself just as much protection from a private insurance company for that kind of money?

A. No. A number of persons are spreading this story, but it just isn't so.

A young man of (say) 25, just entering the work-force, could not buy, for the amount he pays in Social Security taxes, a private annuity policy that would pay as much as the pres-

This not only protects the improvident and the unlucky; it protects the prudent against unforeseeable disasters. No private insurance can do that.

Q. Why don't we just put in a cost-of-living escalator on Social Security benefits — to keep them on a par with prices?

A. There is nothing wrong with an escalator arrangement if it is properly applied. But an escalator should not be used as a way of keeping inadequate benefits in the same place. Basic benefits should be raised by 50 percent, quite apart from escalator provisions.

Also, an escalator clause should take into consideration that if the general standard of American life rises, aside from prices, that of Social Security beneficiaries should rise as well.

discussed in terms of the old folks, but actually, it's a young people's program, too.

Suppose one of the old folks got sick. It might have killed you financially, until a couple of years ago. Not anymore, thanks to medicare.

Or you're driving home late one night and some nut with hot wheels knocks you into the branches. If you're just crippled, Social Security will keep you and your hopes alive; if you're dead, Social Security will take care of your wife and kids.

But lets say you get old. The average single member has a Social Security income of less than $1,000 a year; the average couple, about $1,700.

Do you think an increase of 15 or 20 — or even 50 percent — would be "too far"? Would you like to live on this kind of income?

Q. My folks have a union pension plan and so do I. Don't most people have something else besides Social Security to protect them?

A. No. If you do, and your folks do, you belong to a very fortunate minority. Only 15% of those presently retired have any sort of private pension income. The other 85% depend on Social Security alone. About 30% of the present labor force is covered by some sort of private pension arrangement. In another 15 or 20 years, this will show up in the pension statistics. But that will still leave 70% with nothing but Social Security.

Consider just one statistic. About a third of the aged don't have a telephone, because they can't afford it. How would you like that, come 65?

Q. Under the income tax, the or older who never qualified for Social Security pensions — a provision adopted along with medicare in 1965 — would be $50 rather than $35 a month ($75 instead of $52.50 for a couple). And another 200,000 persons would be added to the 900,000 eligible for such benefits.

For other pensioners — the vast majority — the basic increase would be 15%.

Q. How much are we going to pay for this?

A. Let's just look at the next three years. You are now paying 4.4% in Social Security taxes on everything you earn, up to $6,600 a year. Under the present law, the rate will go up to 4.9% in 1969.

The new proposals would raise your tax rate to 5% (instead of 4.9%) in 1969. Next year, it would increase the earnings base to $7,800.

Now for the dollars and cents. If you earn $7,000 a year, in 1968 — the proposals would cost you an extra $17.60.

If you still earn $7,000 in 1969, the higher tax rates will add another $42. But $35 of this is already scheduled; only $7 would be added by the proposed improvements.

Remember that most of this tax increase is already law. The new bill would amount to only 10¢ on each $100 of earnings.

Bear in mind that you're paying for a Social Security package that includes many other benefits plus retirement.

Q. What "other benefits"?

A. Medicare for the aged is part of the package. So is disability insurance, regardless of age, if you are totally unable to work for a year or more; a lifetime income if catastrophe

A young man of (say) 25, just entering the work-force, could not buy, for the amount he pays in Social Security taxes, a private annuity policy that would pay as much as the present Social Security retirement benefit 40 years later.

He could buy a private policy that would pay about 25% more than present Social Security retirement benefits IF he could add the employer's equal tax payment to his own. That's a very big IF, and it's not the only one.

To maintain his private policy, the young man would need to have 40 uninterrupted years of earnings high enough to pay the premiums. A worker can earn maximum benefits over a 10-year period under Social Security.

But that's only part of the story.

The private policy would set a fixed, dollar benefit payable on maturity; Social Security benefits have gone up periodically in the past and are sure to rise in the future.

The private policy would cover retirement income only, except for some insurance provision in the event of death. It would not include (at this price) any disability coverage, much less medicare.

This kind of protection could not be bought at any price. Social Security (unlike private insurance companies) does not need to show a profit, and pays its executives by government rather than by executive-suite standards.

There are other considerations:

Social Security draws on the resources of the whole community to make sure that, in the public interest and for the benefits of all, every employed person has a measure of security in his old age, or in the event of his untimely death or disability.

Also, an escalator clause should take into consideration that if the general standard of American life rises, aside from prices, that of Social Security beneficiaries should rise as well.

Q. But let's say I'm 35 or 40 years away from retirement. I'll pay the money all those years, but I won't get any more benefits than somebody who paid only 10 years at the same rate. Is that fair?

A. Every insurance system is based on averages and probabilities, including Social Security. There is no way of guaranteeing that every participant will get back more than he put in, or even as much. But your chances are infinitely greater under Social Security.

First, you are only putting up half; the employer is matching you. Second, if you live to 65 you have the pension. If you die earlier you have the death benefit and survivors' support. If you're disabled before 65, or sick afterwards, you also collect.

Q. I'm not against helping the old people, but aren't we going a little too far?

A. No, we're not; even from the standpoint of the very young. Sure, Social Security has generally been

THE LAG IN SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Increases in Wages and Cost of Living Compared to Increase in Social Security Benefits, 1954 – 1966 (Sept.)

1 Increase in Average Hourly Earnings excluding overtime and interindustry shifts.
2 Consumer Price Index.
3 Based on percentage increase in average monthly benefit of a single worker who retired in 1954.

Consider just one statistic. About a third of the aged don't have a telephone, because they can't afford it. How would you like that, come 65?

Q. Under the income tax, the more you make, the higher rate you pay. But everybody pays the same rate on Social Security, even the millionaires. Do you think that's right?

A. No, it's not — but it's not as unfair as it sounds. The benefit formulas are arranged to pay more, in proportion, to those with the lowest earnings. So while the lower-paid are taxed proportionately more when they're working they get a bigger break when they collect.

Q. Let's look down the road a little farther. There's going to be a push for bigger pensions, for expanded medicare. Who's going to pay for that?

A. To a great degree, you are. You want a secure old age, not lavish, but with enough money to live decently. It has to be paid for, one way or another; partly perhaps, with a company pension plan (using money you might otherwise have had in wages) and through Social Security (half paid for by a tax on employers — money you would be unlikely to get otherwise).

You want some kind of protection against the unexpected — death, disability, chronic illness — for yourself and those you're responsible for. Only Social Security can do that job.

Q. But seriously — where will it all end?

A. We hope it won't end until the Social Security concept in the United States catches up with and surpasses the rest of the world.

If West Germany can spend 17 percent of its gross national product; Belgium, 14.4; Britain, 11.1; Ireland, 8.9, for social welfare, surely the United States can do better than 7 percent.

The following pages contain excerpts of both the prepared testimony and the question-and-answer discussion when Walter P. Reuther appeared before the Ribicoff Committee of the U.S. Senate.

The date was December 5, 1966. The technical name of the Senate group is the Subcommittee on Executive Reorganization of the Senate Committee on Government Operations. Under the leadership of Senator Abraham Ribicoff (D. Conn.), it has been conducting a searching and thoughtful examination of the many problems that confront the American city.

Reuther appeared on behalf of three organizations: as president of the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO; as president of the UAW; and as chairman of the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty.

Dirksen Plan Again?

The Supreme Court's one man, one vote ruling is under siege again.

The conservative interests that oppose it—the Farm Bureau, some state legislators and right-wing groups—have prevailed on 32 state legislatures to pass resolutions calling for a constitutional convention to overturn the Court decision. This leaves them two short of the two-thirds of the states Article V of the Constitution requires for Congress to call such a convention.

The masterminds behind the campaign appear to be borrowing a gambit from prize-fighting. It's a classic move in boxing. First, you feint with your left. Then, with your opponent distracted—bang—you cross with a hard right.

The feint seems to be the constitutional convention. The hard right appears to be new pressure they can bring on Congress to do the job itself on one man, one vote if enough state legislatures act. They want to breathe new life into the Dirksen amendment which twice fell short of a two-thirds majority in the Senate in recent years.

The amendment, proposed by Minority Leader Everett Dirksen (R.-Ill.) would permit one house of a state legislature to apportion on grounds other than population. In effect, this would destroy the one man, one vote rule by freezing one house of a legislature in a rural-conservative posture.

The Senate has been alerted to the tactics of the fair representation foes. Sens. Joseph Tydings (D.-Md.) and William Proxmire (D.-Wisc.) who led the battle against the Dirksen amendment two years ago haven't been faked out by the left-hand feint. Recently on the Senate floor, Tydings had this to say about it:

"The idea seems to be to get so many state legislatures to ask for a convention that Congress will be terrified into proposing the kind of pro-malapportionment amendment it has twice rejected in two years. For a constitutional convention . . . could not be limited to the reapportionment issue, but could make wholesale revisions in our cherished and sacred 180-year-old charter of government."

Tydings pointed out the opponents of one man, one

PROXMIRE

. . . Once more into the breach

"After a period of the doldrums the push (to kill 1-and-1) got new drive from last November's electoral upheaval, an event that turned out Democratic majorities and installed Republican. . . . Republicans generally find strong political support in rural areas which were the big losers from legislative reapportionment. . . . Legislatures which previously had been cool toward the constitutional convention scheme embraced it under Republican leadership."—Columnist Thomas O'Neill, Baltimore Sun

The day that made the difference, of course, was Nov. 8, 1966, election day. And the difference is glaringly apparent in a comparison of the charts at left.

At top left is the Congressional Quarterly boxscore on progress of major legislation at about the time of Easter recess in the first session of the 89th Congress, 1965.

Below left is the CQ boxscore as Congress went into its Easter recess little more than a week ago. You can almost feel the difference.

A sense of urgency swept the 89th Congress. There was much to be done, and the liberal class of 1964 that came in on the Johnson landslide meant to do it. By Easter recess in the first session of the 89th Congress:

- Medicare was well along;
- Appalachia aid was already enacted;
- Regional medical centers legislation was underway;
- The House had passed and the Senate was working on sweeping education legislation;
- Both bodies were conducting hearings on higher education;
- Water pollution control was about to go on the books;
- A major housing bill was en route;
- Overhaul of our restrictive immigration laws was imminent;
- Manpower amendments, drug controls and the voting rights bill all were in the works.

As the chart below left shows, no sense of urgency prevails in the 90th Congress. Though there is still much to be done, the congressional will to do it is missing.

It vanished November 8 when the solid liberal majority in Congress was chopped, and the power of the conservative coalition was resurrected.

As the 90th Congress went into the 1967 Easter recess, headway on major legislation was at a minimum, as the chart shows.

The only program enacted involves supplemental funds for the war in Viet Nam. The Senate approved a consular treaty with the Soviet Union. Some progress has been made on the investment tax credit and congressional reform.

Other legislation is in the hearing stage at best. Much of the action centers not on needed new programs but on funding existing programs. Many of these are in trouble in the new Congress.

It's all because of election day 1966, which is something to chew on for there's going to be another important election day in about a year and a half.

vote "apparently hope to confront Congress with an ultimatum: Either give us an amendment to reinstate the rotten borough system of state apportionment, or give us a constitutional convention in which all your rights will be up for grabs."

Tydings was referring to the fact that a constitutional convention would be wide open for anything. There's never been one since the Constitution was adopted. There is no apparent limit on what can be brought up in such a convention. It's open-ended. If one were held the conservative and right wing anti-one man, one vote crowd could throw in everything including income tax repeal and any other of their pet projects. Indeed, conceivably even the Bill of Rights could be tampered with.

Senator Proxmire points out facts that make it almost certain, however, that the real aim is another trip to the well with the Dirksen amendment. Proxmire has charged that 26 of the 32 state resolutions were passed by legislatures that were themselves unconstitutionally apportioned at the time of passage.

The further fact that the whole issue of a constitutional convention opens a can of worms Congress could wrestle with for a century indicates the sneak character of the state legislative attack on one man, one vote. These questions are raised:

1. What is a valid call of two-thirds of the legislatures? Should all calls be worded the same? Many of them are differently worded.

2. Is there a time limit during which the required number of legislatures must call for a convention? Some experts say all calls must be submitted to a single Congress. The existing calls span several years.

3. Are calls by malapportioned state legislatures valid? Proxmire, Tydings and other experts say no.

4. Can a state retract its call for a convention? Maryland fell a vote short of doing it. Other states are being urged to rescind theirs.

5. Is Congress obliged to call a convention even if the required number of states demand it?

6. How would Congress go about it if it decided to call a convention? There are no precedents.

7. Could the convention be limited just to the one issue? Most experts think it couldn't be and that an open-end convention would be unavoidable.

8. How would the convention itself be apportioned?

9. How would delegates be chosen? By popular vote? By state legislative appointment?

On almost all these questions the Constitution is silent, and the answers would be hard coming.

The one man, one vote foes must know this, too. And this is why their ploy almost certainly is to blackmail Congress into a new go-around with the Dirksen amendment.

In Orbit for COPE

Question: Is it possible any trade union unit of 100 will contribute $500—$5 a head—to COPE?

Answer: Yes, it's possible. In fact, it's happened.

The 100 members of Transport Workers Local 525 who are in the firemen's unit at Cocoa Beach, Fla., missile base contributed $500 to COPE, $5 per member. The entire local has contributed nearly $2,500 in voluntary collections for COPE.

Heading up the firemen's unit is John Tillis, while the local union president is M. D. Clabaugh.

New Dollar Drive Leaflets Available

Two new leaflets stressing the importance of giving a buck to COPE now are available free of charge, for general distribution. They are COPE Publication No. 172C, "Wanta Lick Some Problems," and No. 173C, "Five Reasons Why You Should Not Give a Buck to COPE—and 1 Reason Why You Should." Tax Bite Deeper In Other Nations Taxes bug you? Take heart. You're not hit nearly as hard as citizens in any other major industrial western nation.

This conclusion comes from a study by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. The study measured total tax collections as a percentage of gross national product. The U.S. percentage is 27.3. Sweden tops the list with 39 percent, followed by France, 38.5; Austria, 35.25; Norway, 34.9; West Germany, 34.4; Netherlands, 34.1; Britain, 29.9; Belgium and Denmark, 29.7; Italy, 29.6.

Canada and Switzerland, less industrial than the other nations, are slightly below the U.S.

The taxes covered include income, local property, sales, excise, corporate profits, social security and certain taxes unique to European nations.

One-Liners

DESPITE HANKY-PANKY of conservatives and rightists attacking one man, one vote, the Supreme Court has before it several cases to extend the doctrine to county and city governments. The cases will be argued before the Court April 17. They involve the school board in Kent County, Mich.; the governing board of Houston County, Ala.; the board of supervisors, Suffolk County, N.Y.; the council of Virginia Beach, Va.

DON'T GET SICK, whatever you do. Soaring medical costs turn sickness into a luxury few can afford. Experts say a day in the hospital soon will cost an average of $57.93, will balloon to $75 in a few years. In past 10 years, average over-all medical care cost has climbed 27.7 percent across the nation. D.C. led the parade at 38.9; Minneapolis-St. Paul, 38.6; Baltimore, 38.2. Other big jumps: Cleveland, 35.4; Detroit, 35.2; Pittsburgh, 34.6; Chicago, 34.2; Kansas City, 34.1; Cincinnati and Philadelphia, 31.9; San Francisco, 31.1; New York, 29.7; Boston, 28.6. The rise is the fastest in our history.

IN LINE WITH THIS, writer Bob Orben says in Saturday Review of Literature: "I can't wait to see that motion picture about socialized medicine in Britain—Born Free."

IT WAS ONE STRIKE, for Sen. Everett Dirksen. He had been advised he would receive the right-wing Order of Lafayette freedom award. Then he went and voted for ratification of the U.S.-Soviet consular treaty. The award was yanked.

ALSO REBUFFED was Alabama's not-so-far-behind-the-scenes ex-governor, George Wallace. Georgia Gov. Lester Maddox told him no dice on any third party move. Maddox had been counted on to bulwark Wallace's expected third party presidential try in 1968.

A BIG SPENDER, AFTER ALL, is what California Gov. Ronald Reagan turns out to be. His campaign pledge of "cut, squeeze and trim" goes down drain as he proposes the biggest state budget in U.S. history, $5.06 billion, a billion more than Governor Rockefeller seeks in New York and a half-billion over Pat Brown's last budget.

SENATE BATTLE LOOMS over campaign financing law passed hurriedly in last days of 89th Congress. The law okays a voluntary check-off of $1 on your tax form to be split between major parties in presidential years. Sen. Albert Gore (D.-Tenn.) wants it repealed, charges use of huge boodle for each party would be uncontrollable particularly in absence of stiffened election reforms. He says, too, it discriminates against minor parties—none would ever benefit—and that it raises constitutional question: If taxpayer can check off $1 for political contribution, why can't he designate how his other tax money is used?

EVERY CITY IN U.S. has too much sulfur oxide in its air, HEW reports. It's one of the big pollutants, comes from burning coal and oil. Safe limit is below .015 parts per million on yearly average. All cities exceed this figure. HEW says this is big reason for increased hospital cases for respiratory and certain infectious diseases.

IT'S A CLUTTERED FIELD currently in GOP presidential sweepstakes. George Romney and Richard Nixon appear definitely in it. Romney for President office opens in Washington. Nixon gives blessing to nationwide Nixon for President Committee. Ronald Reagan's name mentioned often enough in press to stir liberal GOP Ripon Society into public warning against him as a candidate. Some GOP die-hards still plunk for comeback presidential bid by Barry Goldwater, and Goldwater himself said recently Charles Percy might have the best chance of any Republican against President Johnson. Finally, there's still occasional talk of Nelson Rockefeller as possible candidate.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST "ONE-MAN, ONE-VOTE" LEGISLATURES REVIVES

The attempt to upset the Supreme Court reapportionment decisions has taken a new tack. Defeated twice in their efforts to get Congress to approve a constitutional amendment that would nullify the Court ruling that state legislatures must apportion themselves on a "one-man, one-vote" basis, opponents led by Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen have carried the campaign to the states. While they are gaining support here, the prospects for ultimate success are dubious.

A Call for a Constitutional Convention

Article V of the Constitution prescribes that Congress upon "the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several states shall call a convention for proposing amendments....." That call is pressing upon Congress as it never has before. Two-thirds of the several states is 34 and already 32 have passed resolutions calling for the Constitutional convention. Dirksen has predicted that the remaining two calls will reach Congress soon.

How it Began

Most of the petitions for a convention are not new. The first of the pending ones were passed in 1963. Indeed, Senators William Proxmire (D., Wisc.) and Joseph Tydings (D., Md.), leaders of the opposition to the convention call, estimate that at least 26 of the 32 state legislatures were malapportioned when they passed their convention resolutions. The Senators contend these petitions are invalid.

However, this issue is not clear. Very little connected with the campaign is clear since there is no precedent for calling a convention. There are numerous questions that need to be settled. Must all of the resolutions be identical? Is a petition good indefinitely? How does Congress go about calling a convention and must it call one if 34 states ask? Most troubling of all is whether a constitutional convention, if it were called, would limit itself solely to an amendment on reapportionment. It is entirely likely that the country would be faced with a "runaway convention" ready to change the Bill of Rights or alter other provisions of the Constitution.

Even if the campaign for the constitutional convention does not succeed, Dirksen may be using it as a means of gaining leverage for another attempt to get the Senate to adopt his amendment. Last year he failed by only seven votes. He may hope that Congress will be sufficiently intimidated by the call from the states to agree to his proposal.

What's at Stake

The present move in the states is aimed at the adoption of an amendment that would permit one house of bicameral legislature to be apportioned on some basis other than population. But such an amendment would almost certainly undermine the progress being made toward reapportioning legislatures responsive to the needs of most of the voters in the states. It could very well result in legislatures where the actions of one house that represented people could be blocked in the other body by the hide-bound, largely rural interests that have for so many years blocked state action on socially progressive legislation.

Maryland provided a vivid example this year of what a fairly reapportioned legislature can do. The reconstituted body passed a fair housing law, a relatively mild one, but one that puts the state firmly on record in support of open occupancy. It would be tragic if such progress were halted or reversed.

A Complicated Matter

Despite the urgency and dangers of the present situation it needs to be handled with caution. The complexities and time tables for adjournment one encounters among the legislatures of 50 states makes it impossible to put forward a single blueprint for action. In some states, vigorous campaigns against convention calls could stir opposition. In any case, there should be close consultation with state legislators who support reapportionment before any campaign is undertaken. Here are some rough guidelines.

At present there are 16 state legislatures meeting and the last two calls may come from them. In two of the states, Alaska and Iowa, the threat is imminent. In each state a convention call has passed the House and is now being considered by committees of the Senate. Groups in the Leadership Conference with strong chapters in Iowa should keep alert to the situation. An open campaign might be unwise but letters to Governor Harold Hughes expressing concern and asking him to use his influence with the Senate could be helpful here.

In the following states convention calls have been introduced but no action has been taken on them as this MEMO is written: Michigan, Pennsylvania, Vermont and Wisconsin.

In these states, no calls have been introduced as yet: California, Connecticut, Delaware, Hawaii, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Rhode Island. Here no action is needed but your chapters should keep close watch, remembering that the recent calls have usually been rammed through with little advance notice and no debate.

32 Calls

Here are the 32 states in which convention calls have been adopted:

Alabama	Louisiana	North Dakota
Arizona	Maryland	Oklahoma
Arkansas	Minnesota	South Carolina
Colorado	Mississippi	South Dakota
Florida	Missouri	Tennessee
Georgia	Montana	Texas
Idaho	Nebraska	Utah
Illinois	Nevada	Virginia
Indiana	New Hampshire	Washington
Kansas	New Mexico	Wyoming
Kentucky	North Carolina

Senator Tydings, in a recent speech, presented tables that describe the actions of these states in detail. We include these tables with this MEMO to supply information you may need to plan a course of action for your organization.

UAW STATEMENT ON PRINCIPLES, POLICIES AND PROGRAMS FOR THE AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT

On December 28, 1966, the officers of the UAW, upon the instruction of the UAW Executive Board, issued an Administrative Letter to all UAW Local Unions regarding the relationship of the UAW with the AFL-CIO. This Administrative Letter stated in part:

> ". . . the AFL-CIO . . . suffers from a sense of complacency and adherence to the status quo and is not fulfilling the basic aims and purposes which prompted the merger of the AFL and the CIO. The AFL-CIO lacks the social vision, the dynamic thrust, the crusading spirit that should characterize the progressive, modern labor movement which it can and must be if it is to be equal to the new challenges and the new opportunities of our 20th century technological society."

The International Executive Board concluded that the UAW, "is obligated to speak out on fundamental issues and to express openly our Union's disagreements with the AFL-CIO whenever, in our judgment, the failures or inaction of the AFL-CIO require it."

On February 3, 1967 the International Executive Board took further momentous action when it directed its officers to resign from their respective positions on the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the AFL-CIO General Board, and the AFL-CIO Standing Committees. These resignations became effective immediately.

In an Administrative Letter dated February 8, 1967, a clarifying statement was issued concerning these resignations and the relationship of the UAW with the AFL-CIO, which stated:

> "The UAW's disagreements with the AFL-CIO are basic and fundamental. They relate directly to democratic trade union principles and policies and the development and implementation of sound union programs. They relate to the overall, far reaching question: What should be the essential role of labor's cause in our 20th century technological society and how best can the labor movement fulfill its purposes and its responsibilities to its members, their families and to the whole of society."

The Administrative Letter noted further that the UAW would advance "Programs and policies for consideration by the American labor movement which we believe are essential to get the American labor movement off dead center and on the march."

Statements have already been issued or will shortly be issued and sent as Administrative Letters to all UAW Local Unions setting forth a program for a national organizing crusade for the American labor movement; a proposal for an overall economic and collective bargaining program for the labor movement; and a proposal for the internal reform and democratization of the AFL-CIO.

These statements contained specific proposals covering a wide range of policies and programs for the labor movement. Essentially these proposals are as follows:

I. Organizing the Unorganized

The UAW proposal for a national organizing crusade is a call for a total effort on the part of the American labor movement to match its will with its resources in the historic task of organizing the millions of unorganized. Its goal is to double the membership of the organized labor movement in the United States in the next 6 years.

To achieve this goal, the UAW specifically proposes:

1. Twenty-five percent of the annual income of the AFL-CIO should be earmarked in a special organizing fund for a massive organizing crusade. Based on the reported income of the AFL-CIO for 1966, which approximates $12.5 million, this proposal would set aside $3.125 million.

2. In addition, each affiliated union should contribute to the special organizing fund a special per capita tax of 7 cents per month. Based on current AFL-CIO membership of 13,600,000 this would add approximately $11.4 million to the $3.125 million earmarked from AFL-CIO income, to make a total of about $14.525 million a year.

3. The commitment to support an organizing crusade of this dimension should extend for a six-year period, subject to continuous review to insure maximum effectiveness. With financial resources of this magnitude, an organizing crusade can be undertaken which would have at least the promise of being equal to the task.

4. The organization efforts flowing from this crusade will, of course, be supplemented by organizational activities and resources of individual affiliated unions and of AFL-CIO departments.

5. One-third of the total organizing fund, but with a minimum of $5 million, should be earmarked annually and directed toward organizing the farm and migratory workers and the millions of working poor, the balance to be allocated for the organizing effort involving the as yet unorganized industrial and construction trades workers, workers in the service industries, the teachers, and the office, technical, professional, Federal government, state and municipal workers.

6. To stimulate the implementation of such a coordinated, comprehensive, cooperative organizing crusade, and as a token of the UAW's good faith and its deep commitment to the task of organizing the unorganized, the UAW International Executive Board is earmarking and putting in escrow $1.5 million which will represent an advance payment on the UAW's obligations under the proposal, when the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions are prepared effectively to implement an organizational crusade of these dimensions.

The 7 cents per capita per month contribution by the affiliates may cause some financial strain to some unions, especially those which are small and weak but which have great organizing potential. These, however, are the very unions which will receive maximum assistance from the overall organizing fund so that, in effect, the strong will be helping the weak to organize and build their unions.

7. An administrative structure should be carefully designed and established to maximize coordination and cooperation and to assume the responsibility for formulating overall policies, developing overall programs and for reviewing organizing activities as they develop. A specific detailed administrative structure has been set forth based essentially on the structure proposed by Walter P. Reuther for a full scale organizing program to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in February, 1961.

8. It is essential and urgent, however, if the great effort to mount a national organizing crusade is to succeed, that the narrow, restrictive policy be abandoned that permits the paper jurisdiction of any one affiliated union to veto the will and desire of other affiliates. This policy has in the past thwarted coordinated and cooperative organizing efforts by the AFL-CIO and it must by now be abundantly clear that to continue to apply such a negative policy of procedure and administration is to deprive the whole labor movement of its great opportunity to bring its total organizing commitment to fruition.

9. Anti-union employers continue in their effort to thwart union organization by defying the law and exploiting National Labor Relations Board procedures. They invoke costly and prolonged litigation which affords them protection while they continue to violate the law. The AFL-CIO Council should establish a special sub-committee of the Executive Council and a special task force of lawyers drawn from the AFL-CIO Legal Department and legal counsel of affiliated unions to make a continuing effort to minimize delays and remove the obstacles to legitimate organizing efforts and the subsequent negotiation of collective bargaining contracts.

10. Appropriate steps should be taken to utilize the creative contribution and the resources of state and local bodies of the AFL-CIO and each affiliate should be urged to mobilize the broadest base of support by encouraging the creation of organizing committees in its local unions so that they may share in the work of the National Organizing Crusade.

With regard to the program to organize the poor both on the farm and in the city, the proposal stresses utilization of the newly emerging concept of "community unionism" which is designed to provide the poor with their own self-sufficient economic organization in their community and cuts across many areas of social and economic need in the communities in which they live: health care, schools, public transportation, sanitation, building maintenance, etc. The concept of "community unionism", it was pointed out, departs from the tradition of jurisdictional claims and the value of dues dollars and could represent a "new tool for constructive social change which will appropriately reflect the fundamental principles and human and social values" to which the labor movement must be committed.

As a continuing commitment to the UAW's efforts to assist in the tremendous task of organizing farm and migratory workers, it is urged that UAW local unions make further financial contributions to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee of the AFL-CIO and to emerging farm and migratory worker organizing committees in the various states where UAW local unions are located. These financial contributions, moreover, can be supplemented by personal visits of local union leaders with the farm and migratory workers in the area where their organizing efforts are being undertaken and by supplying food, clothing and other of life's necessities to help them in their cause.

II. Proposal for an Overall Economic and Collective Bargaining Program For The Labor Movement

In order for the American labor movement to fulfill its responsibilities to the workers it represents and to act in the best interests of the nation as a whole, it is essential that it establish an overall economic and collective bargaining program aimed toward achieving equity for wage earners consistent with the overall needs of the economy and the reality of our evolving technology. The UAW has set forth a specific program covering a number of significant areas of concern aimed toward accomplishing this objective. The program urges:

1. Development of a national incomes policy designed to achieve maximum economic growth and maximum employment and to provide workers the greater equity to which they are entitled out of the increased productivity and the greater profitability of our developing technology within the framework of a stable price structure;

2. Adoption of a National Price-Wage Review Board procedure which will bring enlightened public opinion to bear on price and wage determinations without imposing governmental controls, coupled with the establishment of an Office of National Consumer Counsel to act in the interest of the consumer when prices are unnecessarily and excessively high;

3. Adoption of a collective bargaining mechanism which will establish a more rational method to determine the workers' wage and benefit equity. This would involve establishing the basic equity of the worker in contract negotiations and determining his ultimate supplemental equity based on the economic facts after the profits are earned, just as is the practice for determining the equity for management personnel through sharing of the profits;

4. Extension of the concept of "coordinated bargaining" throughout the labor movement so that all unions having bargaining rights with the same company will cooperate in coordinating their negotiating efforts toward common objectives;

5. The establishment of an Electronic Data Processing Center for the entire labor movement to facilitate the gathering and dissemination of factual information needed to assist union negotiators;

6. The establishment of a United Labor Defense Fund of the labor movement, financed by an annual contribution by all affiliates of $1 per member (based on current AFL-CIO membership, this would amount to $13.6 million a year), to assist workers under attack by anti-union employers bent on destroying their union and denying them the benefits of collective bargaining;

7. The development of a program to unite the labor movement behind individual affiliates whose efforts to negotiate a first contract after winning representation rights are being thwarted by employer user of illegal tactics of delay and harassment;

8. Full mobilization of broad public support to end government procurement policies which provide government subsidies for companies which are found to be in flagrant violation of the law. The J. P. Stevens and Company is a case in point. This company has been found in flagrant violation of the law on numerous counts by the National Labor Relations Board including the illegal discharge and harrassment of scores of its workers and yet this company is still being subsidized by government contracts approximating $75 million dollars;

9. The development and implementation of a positive and constructive program to enable workers in critical and vital public service industries to achieve equity comparable with other workers under circumstances in which workers in these industries will not be forced to resort to strike action that endangers the health and safety of the public.

III. Proposals for Internal Reform and Democratization of the AFL-CIO

The UAW International Executive Board, in the Administrative Letter dated February 8, 1967, took sharp note of the need for internal democratic reforms within the structure of the AFL-CIO which would serve to promote and insure that the programs, policies and activities of the labor movement reflect the high moral and social objectives of labor's cause.

Specifically the UAW proposals for internal reform and democratization of the AFL-CIO include:

1. Establish the AFL-CIO Executive Committee as required by the AFL-CIO Constitution and make it a meaningful, functioning Committee;

2. Expand the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO to make it more representative of all sections of the labor movement and instill new ideas, new vision and new vitality;

3. Provide the AFL-CIO General Board the opportunity to share fully in leadership responsibility in shaping major program and policy decisions and in insuring their effective implementation;

General Board meetings should be scheduled for two or three-day sessions at least three times a year with the right of the members of the General Board to add to the agenda of such meetings;

4. Strengthen the work and responsibility of Standing Committees to enable them to make their maximum constructive contribution to the labor movement;

5. Provide a procedure for keeping verbatim minutes of Executive Council meetings in keeping with the normal practice of democratic legislative bodies;

6. Establish a Public Review Board for the labor movement modeled after the UAW Public Review Board and charged with the responsibility to enforce the AFL-CIO Ethical Practices Code and to defend the democratic rights of members;

7. Strengthen the state and local federations and councils by provision in the AFL-CIO Constitution to insure that local unions, chapters or lodges of AFL-CIO affiliates will participate fully in and assume their proportionate share of the cost to perform the essential functions of state, and local bodies of the AFL-CIO.

IV. Labor's Role and Responsibility in the Community

In addition to the specific proposals already set forth and described in detail by the UAW in earlier Administrative Letters, additional programs should be undertaken by the American labor movement reflecting its role and responsibility in the community-at-large.

The history of the free labor movement in the United States and other democratic countries has been a history of labor's involvement in bringing about basic constructive social change so that human dignity and social justice could be made more universal and the superiority of men over machines and the priority of human rights over property rights could be established. The American labor movement had the stars of social idealism in its eyes since its early beginning when it fought to abolish child labor, to establish the 8-hour day, to win free public education for all our children and to win social security and human dignity for people in the autumn years of their lives.

When a labor movement loses this sense of historic purpose of advancing the frontiers of human betterment and human brotherhood motivated by social idealism, it ceases to be a labor movement. The difference between a labor movement and a labor organization is its measure of social idealism and human commitment.

Continuing objective and critical self-examnation is the hallmark of an organization with social idealism. If the labor movement is to fulfill its ultimate aims and purposes as a constructive force for social change, it must consistently search within itself for new answers to new problems which will benefit the whole of society. Only in this way can it anticipate the necessary broad public support essential to the labor movement's commitment as a vital force for economic and social progress.

The prestige, the influence and the effectiveness of the AFL-CIO can be enhanced if it will demonstrate the intellectual courage and the self-discipline needed for objective self-examination—if it will ask itself what is wrong with the labor movement as well as what is wrong outside the labor movement.

In this regard, the labor movement cannot overlook the results of the national survey undertaken in April 1966 in which key occupations throughout the nation were given ratings by the public at large. The results of this survey showed that labor leaders ranked 16th out of a total of 17 of these key occupations in the country with only the advertising men—the "Madison Avenue hucksters"—rated lower than labor leaders.

The influence of the American labor movement can only continue to diminish unless the AFL-CIO recognizes more than it has in the past that it cannot be a narrow and restricted pressure group but must reflect the interests of all of society and it must translate these noble commitments beyond the phrases of pious platitudes into specific activities aimed at reducing or eliminating the social ills of mankind, bearing always in mind that the labor movement must not isolate itself but must act as a responsible partner in a democratic community.

The labor movement must participate actively and intensely in broad community programs and activities such as:

1. The development of programs and policies for labor to play its rightful role and meet its responsibilities in the task of rebuilding our cities and rural areas and making low-cost, high quality housing available through the use of the new tools of science and technology in creating a wholesome living environment worthy of free men.

   The AFL-CIO has an immediate and urgent obligation to play a leading role in the great effort to rebuild our cities, eliminate the slums and develop an economic and social base for the deprived which will help them to lift themselves out of their squalor.

   Such a gigantic effort must recognize the need to develop programs and policies that will make it possible to utilize the new tools of science and technology essential to rebuilding not only our cities, but our rural areas as well. Utilization of new technology, new means of production and construction in erecting buildings and in rehabilitating the old but repairable structures is a necessary aspect of such a rebuilding program. The massiveness of this undertaking requires our nation to apply the newest technology to construction to insure that the structures will be sound and that the costs of construction will be reduced. The task of rebuilding America and creating a wholesome, new and attractive living environment worthy of free people will open up new opportunities for higher and more secure and steady employment for workers in the construction and related industries.

2. Providing educational opportunities to facilitate maximum growth and development of America's children and youth;

3. Assuring a fuller measure of security and dignity for America's older citizens through more adequate negotiated pensions and through a major improvement in our Social Security system in order to provide workers a minimum income security during their retirement years equal to two-thirds of their wage averaged over the 10 years of highest earnings. The Social Security system will never provide adequate benefits so long as it relies solely on the payroll tax as the source of its financing. Workers in general and young workers in particular who are confronted with the problems of growing families have been asked to carry a disproportionate burden of the cost of Social Security and they should be relieved of this burden by the Federal government assessing one-third of the cost out of general tax revenues.

4. Removing for every American the economic barriers to access to high quality comprehensive medical and health care by strengthening pre-paid group practice plans and ultimately by achieving national health insurance service using the best features of the voluntary group plans as the basis for its structure.

5. Demonstrating greater courage and compassion in extending equal rights and equal opportunity to every American not only at the community level and through legislation, but, of major importance, within the labor movement itself.

   The AFL-CIO should demonstrate the will and commit the resources needed to undertake an affirmative and deliberately planned program to break down the barriers of discrimination within its own affiliates and to carry out specific programs of apprenticeship pre-training and tutorial assistance in cooperation with its affiliates in order to open up new avenues for Negroes, Mexican Americans and other minority groups to find jobs among those trades where job openings are still closed to them or are at best minimal in number. This effort is needed not only as a matter of basic morality, but to hasten the day when the disenfranchised will consider the labor movement truly their partner in the economic and social struggle for equality.

6. Working with government and private groups in developing economic programs and policies to achieve maximum economic growth and expansion of our national economy, to the end that every American able and willing to work may be assured the opportunity of a socially useful and rewarding job;

7. Providing affirmative and constructive leadership and committing adequate resources necessary to assume full partnership with other groups in the community working to supplement government programs in an all out crusade to abolish human poverty in this land of plenty, in such efforts as are currently being undertaken by the broadly based Citizens Crusade Against Poverty.

8. Assuring a more active role at the federal, state and local community level in cooperation with other citizen groups to promote needed programs to conserve and develop our natural resources, to eliminate pollution of air and water and to beautify and improve our living environment;

9. Sponsoring joint conferences and seminars with the liberal intellectual and academic community and with youth groups in order to build and strengthen the historic alliance with those who can and will be labor's natural allies in the broad effort to advance the common good.

American Labor's Relationship with and Responsibility Toward Strengthening the Free World Labor Movement

The American labor movement must build understanding and cooperation with the labor movements throughout the free world in the common effort to extend the frontiers of economic and social justice and the achievement of dignity and freedom in the world. It is necessary for the AFL-CIO to re-examine and re-evaluate in depth its programs and policies and its attitudes toward and its relationship with the rest of the free world labor movement. This re-examination is essential if the American labor movement is to avoid being further isolated and ineffective and if it is to be one partner in a grand alliance of labor movements all over the free world. It must exercise discretion and sympathetic understanding in the knowledge that the solidarity of the free world labor movement cannot be achieved by a monolithic approach but its unity must be built out of the substance and splendor of diversity.

The Role and Responsibility of American Labor in a Changing World

The American labor movement must play a vital role in developing and extending freedom, and must continue to resist communism and all forms of totalitarianism that would enslave the human spirit.

It must also accept its responsibility toward achieving greater understanding and deeper appreciation of the need to remove the curtain which currently divides the world and the two massive antagonistic power blocs so that the way can eventually be paved toward achieving peaceful agreement. Thus the American labor movement has its obligation to help reduce world tension by helping to build bridges of international understanding leading toward a reduction in armaments, removal of the threat of nuclear annihilation and the building of a just and enduring peace in which people with diverse economic and social systems can live peacefully in a more rational and responsible world community.

The labor movement must play its role in this broad area of man's search for a just peace for the question of peace is the question of human survival. The challenge before the whole of the human family is to end the drift toward nuclear war and find a way to harness man's creative genius in the field of science and technology to man's peaceful purposes.

Now Therefore Be it

RESOLVED: That this Special Convention of the UAW

1. Commends the officers and International Executive Board of the UAW for the actions already taken with regard to the UAW relationship with the AFL-CIO.

2. Gives unqualified support to the programs and policies recommended by the UAW International Executive Board as set forth herein to get the American labor movement off dead center and on the march, and urges their prompt and full implementation.

3. Directs the UAW International Executive Board to present these proposed programs and policies to the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO at an appropriate time after the completion of 1967 UAW collective bargaining negotiations.

4. Authorizes and directs the UAW International Executive Board, upon continuing review of the policies, programs and activities of the AFL-CIO, to take whatever action it deems necessary and appropriate with regard to the relationship of the UAW to the AFL-CIO in the best interests of the UAW membership and their families, the labor movement and the nation as a whole.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY CHANGES JURY SELECTION SYSTEM

In the past, Georgia grand and trial juries were selected from tax digests, which were frequently segregated, and which always eliminated the non-property owner from selection as a juror.

The ACLU in the past three years has brought court challenges all over the South of the convictions of Negro defendants before juries which systematically excluded Negroes from service as jurors. A notable case in Georgia was that of Leon Davis and Phil Whitus, both sentenced to death by an all-white jury almost seven years ago. In January, 1967, the U. S. Supreme Court ruled that they did not receive a fair trial and ordered Georgia to re-try them before a desegregated jury.

As a result of this decision and others, the General Assembly realized that many convictions could be challenged on the same grounds. It therefore passed new legislation abandoning the tax digest and basing selection upon voting lists:

"In composing such list they (the jury commissioners) shall select a fairly representative cross-section of the upright and intelligent citizens of the county from the official registered voter list which was used in the last preceding general election. If at any time, it appears to the jury commissioners that the jury list... is not a fairly representative cross section...they shall supplement such list by going out into the county and personally acquainting themselves with other citizens of the county, including upright and intelligent citizens of any significantly identifiable group which may not be fairly represented thereon."

This is an improvement, but it still permits the jury commissioners to discriminate in their selection of certain jurors and rejection of others.

The ACLU takes the position that the only way to insure a non-discriminatory jury panel is by random selection. That is, after eliminating those whose handicaps would prevent useful service -- the blind or deaf, mentally ill or retarded, inability to understand English, those with previous criminal records, etc. -- selection of the panel should be made by picking every tenth name on the list, or every twentieth, or whatever number is required, without regard to occupation, address, race or other individual characteristics.

PLENARY BOARD ASKS ACLU CONSTITUTION REVISION

Kieve Landesberg, ACLU of Georgia Executive Committee member, was our delegate to the ACLU Plenary Board meeting in New York, March 18th and 19th. The Plenary Board acted on the following:

Statement of Policy: Since 1940, the ACLU Constitution has contained the following sentence: "The ACLU needs and welcomes the support of all those — and only those — whose devotion to civil liberties is not qualified by adherence to Communist, Fascist, KKK or other totalitarian doctrine."

Some years ago, the Southern California affiliate proposed dropping the sentence in favor of what they felt was a more meaningful statement supporting the positive goals of the ACLU. They felt that an individual committed to ACLU goals could not, ipso facto, be an adherent of totalitarian doctrines. To impose this test, they argued, was impracticalbe, because we could not, in any case, investigate the attitudes of ACLU members.

Those opposed to dropping the 1940 Resolution felt that this disclaimer is necessary for the ACLU to maintain its non-partisan defense of civil liberties. The general public, they argued, needs to know that while the ACLU defends individuals regardless of their political views, adherents of totalitarianism or racists will not be allowed as members who could affect ACLU programs and policies.

The policy finally adopted by the Plenary Board is somewhere between these two positions. The Board voted to require that ACLU spokesmen, including all officers, board members and staff personnel must be in accord with the objectives of the ACLU as stated in the Constitution, and that these officers, board members and staff must not advocate fascist, communist or racist doctrines. Since this resolution is limited to a small category of members, membership cards will no longer carry the statement quoted above.

This new resolution will be submitted to the ACLU Electors this Spring. Two-thirds of the Electors -- the National Committee, the Plenary Board and the Boards of Directors of the affiliates -- must approve it before it becomes part of the ACLU Constitution.

Roger Baldwin Foundation: The Plenary Board voted to create a new ACLU arm which would enable us to expand ACLU programs by raising tax exempt funds. The Foundation will accept tax-exempt contributions of $300 and up. It will be set up not to compete with affiliate fund-raising efforts.

Dirksen Amendment: The Plenary Board noted that 32 of the required 34 states have passed resolutions calling for a Constitutional Convention to abrogate the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote decision. Many constitutional lawyers feel that such a Convention might not be limited to just the Dirksen Amendment, but could propose radical amendment of other Constitutional provisions. (Repealing the Bill of Rights might be one horrendous possibility.) Affiliates whose states had not passed such resolutions were urged to exert pressure to prevent their legislatures from so doing.

DIRKSEN AMENDMENT, PLENARY BOARD, CON'T.

Georgia has already passed such a resolution. Observers of the last Georgia election will not be surprised to learn that the Georgia resolution, instead of being sent to Congress, was misdirected to the Library of Congress. This is in keeping with the fine tradition of missing ballots for which our State is justly famous.

Since our General Assembly has already acted, there is nothing for Georgians to do but keep their fingers crossed — hard.

TRESPASSING CONVICTION SET ASIDE

On March 16th, Judge Dan Duke issued an order setting aside the previous conviction of two ACLU clients for trespassing. In so doing, Judge Duke agreed with the contention of ACLU attorney Albert Horn, who said that no trespass had occurred because the initiative to claim trespass had come not from the property owner but from police officers. Judge Duke also stated that the anti-trespass statute itself was of "questionable constitutionality."

The situation of the two ACLU clients is by no means unique. There have been, and continue to be cases in which police officers make arrests for trespassing, loitering and loafing in places of public accommodation, based not on complaints from the owners but on their own initiative and for their own purposes.

In view of these facts, ACLU President Hugh Gibert wrote to Fulton County Solicitor William E. Spence inquiring whether or not his office intended to bring further prosecutions of the same type.

Mr. Spence replied that "under the circumstances (of this case) I will continue to prosecute under the anti-trespass statute, inasmuch as I conscientiously believe this to be the law and even though my position may be reversed."

GEORGIA ACLU SEEKS EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

At the March Executive Committee meeting, Executive Director Florence Robin announced that her family will be moving to Maryland around June 1st. E. T. Kehrer, Hugh Gibert and Edward Ladd were appointed a sub-committee to seek her replacement.

The sub-committee in turn asks ACLU members to tell them about likely candidates. The job is headquartered in Atlanta and pays about $7,500 a year. Understanding of and commitment to ACLU policies are essential; professional experience in a voluntary organization would be useful. Please send your suggestions to the ACLU office at 52 Fairlie Street, N. W., or telephone 404/523-5398.

NATIONAL CRIME COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

"Every time a crime commission is appointed, I shudder," an ACLU Director from another state commented recently. And with good reason. Most of them have generated nothing but scare headlines about the increase in crime and the need to stop "coddling" offenders.

But the President's Commission on Law Enforcement is a marked exception. Its report, issued last month, is a searching examination of the failure of our correctional system, with recommendations for improvement while safeguarding individual liberties. Among the proposals are many which the ACLU has long supported:

Juveniles:

Limit police custody of juveniles to instances where there is objective, specific cause
Increase referrals to community agencies
Narrow juvenile court jurisdiction over non-criminal matters
Provide counsel wherever coercive action is possible.

Community relations:

Establish citizen advisory councils in minority-group areas
Recruit more minority-group officers
Provide adequate procedures for processing citizens grievances against all public officials.

Courts:

Provide defense counsel and probation officers in courts now lacking them
Abolish or reform justices of the peace and U.S. Commissioners
Establish bail projects
Establish station house release and summons procedures
Establish standards for publicity in criminal cases
Eliminate criminal treatment of drunkenness when not accompanied by otherwise unlawful conduct.

Other recommendations deal with upgrading police department salaries and standards, reorganization of correctional institutions, improvement of court procedures, expansion of private research, and establishment of a national agency to coordinate crime research.

We have a twelve-page summary of the Commission's findings, and if there is enough of a demand for it, we will be glad to rerun it for interested members. You might want to call the report to the attention of your local high school and college social studies department, your City Council, Police Department and state legislator.

THIS IS YOUR BALLOT

On February 20th, all ACLU of Georgia members were mailed the slate prepared by the Nominating Committee. No additional nominations having been received in the constitutionally allowed period, the slate of officers is as follows:

President:	E. T. Kehrer, Director, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department
1st Vice-President:	William Alexander, Attorney, Member of Georgia Legislature
2nd Vice-President:	Dr. Faye Goldberg, Psychologist, Member of Morehouse Faculty
Secretary:	Mrs. John Morris, Community Leader
Treasurer:	John Glustrom, Businessman

The Georgia ACLU Executive Committee submits the following Constitutional Amendment:

Article VII - Executive Committee

To the following sentence in Paragraph 1:

"The Executive Committee is to be composed of the duly elected officers, five members of the Advisory Board and the chairmen of the Standing Committees"

add this phrase:

"plus the chairman of each local chapter or an individual designated by the chapter in his place."

This addition is in recognition of the fact that local chapters -- we now have active ones in Athens and Macon -- should share in the day-to-day decision-making processes of our affiliate.

'66 LOOKING BACK

LOOKING AHEAD '68

Early analyses by liberals of 1966 election results tended to go off the deep end of gloom. There's no question about it, the results were dispiriting: More than 40 liberal House members defeated, six liberal governors and two liberal senators swept aside.

But looked at more calmly than it was possible to do in the immediate aftermath of election day, the results fall into clearer perspective. These facts emerge:

• The extent of the off-year swing against the party in control of the White House was greater than usual (47 House seats lost against an average of 37 since the turn of the century) for a significant reason: The President's lopsided 1964 victory distorted traditional voting patterns in many districts, but only temporarily. Many of them turned back into standard shape in 1966, defeating newly-elected liberals, and returned to their conservative norm. At the same time, on a more encouraging note, the normal Senate loss of five seats by the party controlling the White House was reduced in 1966.

• Compared to the last off-year election—1962—COPE-endorsed candidates just about held their own. The number of successful COPE-endorsed House candidates in 1966 was 182. In 1962, a year regarded as a good one for liberals because the usual off-year reverses were minimized, 190 COPE-endorsed House candidates were elected. (In party terms, Democrats elected one more House member outside the south in 1966—165—than in 1962.)

- Thirty-four liberal House members increased their party's share of the vote over 1962, a more accurate measure of comparison than 1964. Of these 34, 20 were victorious in 1966.

- Almost half the first-term liberals elected in the Johnson sweep of 1964 were re-elected in 1966, indicating they have solidified their positions in their respective districts. Seven of these actually increased their margins in 1966.

There is no glossing over the scope of the liberal defeat in 1966. Yet, it can be said that without COPE's best effort ever the defeat would have been more severe. Most of the new liberals who survived 1966 made it by slim margins, and in many instances COPE's program provided the margin.

SOME OF THE FACTORS

Prior to the election, it had become clear that so-called "white backlash" had taken its toll among union members as in the community at-large. Though its precise effect is beyond accurate measurement, some conclusions about it can be made.

1. In 1966 voting statistics, backlash shows up most often not as a switch but as a drop in voter turnout in blue collar and middle income areas. In Cicero, Illinois, for example — where racial feelings were strong — the Democratic vote dropped about 25% from 1962 senatorial figures, and the Republican vote dipped slightly. Senator Paul Douglas' personal vote in Cicero plunged sharply from 19,678 in 1960, when he last ran, to only 7,823 in 1966. In the 1960-1966 comparison, the GOP vote only gained by 3,500, indicating less a massive switch in Cicero to the GOP than an unwillingness among Democratic voters to vote for a strongly pro-civil rights Democrat. They stayed home.

2. In state after state, the Democratic vote failed to come out in numbers comparable to 1962, the last off-year election. The most extreme example occurred in Detroit, where Governor Romney actually polled 11,000 fewer votes than in 1962, but the Democratic gubernatorial vote plummeted by 152,000.

3. In blue collar and middle income wards, the pattern was the same in many cities as in Detroit, notably in Chicago, Philadelphia, Denver, Milwaukee, Phoenix, Minneapolis, Cincinnati, Louisville, Memphis. More than through actual voter defection, then, liberal candidates in these areas were hurt by the stay-at-homes.

Yet, there was vote-switching in some areas, and much of it must be attributed to backlash. Its most serious effects were felt in California.

The California gubernatorial battle came on the heels of two years of intense public focus on racial issues—the 1964 open housing referendum, 1965 riots in Watts, 1966 riots in San Francisco and, a week before the election, highly-publicized vandalism in Alameda.

One assembly district in Alameda switched from 59 percent for Gov. Pat Brown in 1962 to 65 percent for his victorious GOP opponent Ronald Reagan, in 1966. A similar district in Los Angeles switched from 58 percent for Brown in 1962 to 65 percent for Reagan in 1966.

Similar vote-switching occurred in blue collar wards in Omaha, Nebraska, where riots occurred shortly before election day, and in Baltimore where a Democratic candidate made an open racist appeal.

A final problem factor was the sharp drop in the Negro vote from 1962 in all but a few areas outside the south. This drop cut most deeply in the races of liberal Reps. John Gilligan in Cincinnati and George Grider in Tennessee, Senator Paul Douglas in Illinois and Representative Carlton Sickles in the Maryland Democratic gubernatorial primary.

COPE'S ROLE IN 1966

One of the ironies of 1966 was that widespread defeat of liberals came in a year when COPE performed better than ever. It brought home the lesson—by no means a new one—that COPE, though a significant factor, is but one factor in an election. Labor can never account for more than a minority of votes. In close situations, it can provide the margin of victory. In a landslide situation similar to 1966, it can at best take satisfaction in helping prevent even more calamitous results.

Two major factors helped stem what could have been a more far-reaching electoral defeat for liberalism:

1. COPE was provided with more assistance than ever before, from President Meany and the Executive Council through to the ranks of state and local central bodies and from the international unions. From all, COPE had more cooperation, more manpower, membership lists for data processing pilot projects and more coordination of campaign contributions. This produced the best organizational effort ever mounted by COPE.

2. Planning and organizing for the 1966 elections began early in 1965 and continued through the campaign.

These two factors helped achieve the following results:

- Eleven COPE-endorsed House candidates actually increased their winning percentage over 1964.
- In New York, all seven new congressmen won reelection in districts which had been strongly conservative in 1962. (Representative Joseph Resnick's 28th district went 64.1 percent Republican in 1962. Representative James Hanley from Syracuse upped his margin in the 34th district from 51.2 percent in 1964 to 55.1 percent in 1966.)

* Based on unofficial returns

- In Washington, all four new congressmen increased their majorities substantially. Representative Brock Adams won by 63.7 percent in Seattle, while Republicans were winning most lesser offices.
- In New Jersey, two new congressmen won reelection and a third lost by a tiny margin.
- In Pennsylvania's 24th district (Erie), new Congressman Joseph Vigorito upped his majority by nearly three percent, winning with 54.4 percent while the Republican gubernatorial candidate carried his district by 50.6 percent. In the 19th district (York), new Congressman Neiman Craley lost by only 1.5 percent, while the Republican gubernatorial candidate carried his district by 9.3 percent.

- In Colorado, new Congressman Frank Evans won by 51 percent in the Pueblo district which went 54.7 percent Republican in 1962.
- In Connecticut's 4th district (Bridgeport), Representative Don Irwin won the seat he lost in 1962.
- In Illinois, new Congressman Gale Schisler lost the 19th district (Rock Island) by 2.4 percent, while Charles Percy carried the same district by 4.9 percent. (It was 58 percent Republican in 1962.)
- Both Maine districts and the governorship went Republican in 1962 and Democratic in 1966.
- In Michigan, new Congressman Weston Vivian lost the 2nd district by 1.4 percent, while Governor Romney carried it by 18.6 percent. New Congressman Ray Clevenger lost his 11th district in the Upper Peninsula by 1.8 percent, while Romney carried it by 9.8 percent.

These accomplishments, however, cannot obscure the disturbing problems which already have been discussed. They were:

1. the failure of many of our members to vote in spite of our best efforts, and
2. the susceptibility of our own members to racist arguments on civil rights issues.

Both problems can be simply phrased but not easily met. Answers perhaps can be found within the framework of the following known facts:

1. As the average age of the population decreases, so does the average age of union members.

In the next five years, 26 million new voters between the ages of 21 and 23 will be added to the electorate. As new voters, they will have no historical memory of Franklin Roosevelt, the depression or World War II. Many of them will be new union members, but they will have no memory of hard times or of the union battles fought and won, from which they are reaping the benefits.

2. More and more, our white members, with the rest of the white population, will live in suburbs.

Between 1960 and 1965 the white population in all cities, large and small, dropped by more than 250,000. Given the normal growth of a stable population, it should have increased by 4.5 million. Instead, these and more joined the people moving from rural areas and young people starting new families to swell the suburban population by 9.25 million over the same five-year period.

Our organizational structure is traditionally based in central cities. Our problem arises in organizing and educating members who live far beyond the normal jurisdiction of the local central body.

3. Cities are increasingly becoming Negro ghettos. Between 1960 and 1965, the Negro population in cities increased two million, and, in the suburbs, only 400,000.

Our concern relates, not only to our own Negro members in their urban community, but the larger problems of maintaining lines of political communication between all sectors of our organization and our natural allies.

To meet these new circumstances the following approaches seem worth considering.

1. Intensified political education through existing national and state AFL-CIO machinery and in international unions, with special appeals to our younger members.

2. Development of local COPE's on a community basis in order to "go where our members live," which, increasingly, will be in the suburbs.

1968 ELECTIONS

There is no doubt that 1968 will not be an easy year. According to polls, the President's popularity has slipped despite an unmatched record of domestic achievements. The Republicans are unlikely to kick the election away as they did in 1964. And on the President's fate rests the fortunes of other liberal candidates.

The 1966 elections starkly illustrated the penalty liberalism must pay when there is a large incidence of stay-at-home voters. The stay-at-homes in too many cases are union members and others normally most likely to vote for liberal candidates.

The potential effect of large numbers sitting out the 1968 elections can best be understood by examining two Senate races of 1962 won by liberals by close margins. The same senators—Joseph Clark, Pa., and Gaylord Nelson, Wisc.—will be candidates again in 1968. The figures show 1962 votes and 1966 votes in statewide campaigns in states represented by these senators.

PENNSYLVANIA

1962 Clark-D vs. Van Zandt-R	1966 Shapp-D vs. Shafer-R Gubernatorial	VOTE CHANGE
D. 2,238,383	D. 1,868,719	D. Minus 369,664
R. 2,134,649	R. 2,110,349	R. Minus 34,300

WISCONSIN

1962 Nelson-D vs. Wiley-R	1966 Knowles-R vs. Lucey-D Gubernatorial	VOTE CHANGE
D. 637,491	D. 539,258	D. Minus 98,233
R. 625,536	R. 626,041	R. Plus 505

In Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, the high cost of stay-at-homes is startlingly apparent. In Pennsylvania, the GOP vote in a statewide campaign actually declined by 34,300 from 1962 to 1966. But the defeat of COPE-endorsed Milton Shapp is clearly traced to the stay-at-home liberal vote. The Democratic vote declined by 369,664 from 1962 to 1966.

In Wisconsin, the GOP vote gained only 505 from 1962 to 1966, but the Democratic vote declined by 98,233. Here, too, the clear difference was in the large numbers of stay-at-home voters.

Senator Clark won with only 51.1 percent of the vote in 1962, Senator Nelson with only 52.6 percent. Failure of a substantial number of liberals to vote in 1968—as was the case in 1966—could doom their re-election chances.

Other liberal senators face similar re-election problems: Birch Bayh in Indiana, who won with only 50.3 percent of the vote in 1962; Abraham Ribicoff in Connecticut, 51.3 percent; Warren Magnuson of Washington, 52.6 percent; Frank Church of Idaho, 54.7 percent.

In addition to these and other senators, more than a score of marginal liberals in the House will rely for re-election on the heaviest possible turnout among union members and their families.

The broad problems of 1968 have been outlined. It is the solutions that must be filled in. No solutions are guaranteed, but certain questions are suggested:

1. Where does political action and education fit into the program of your international union, local union, state or central body?
2. How much of the resources of these respective bodies is directed to political action and education?
3. Has there been a pattern of increased awareness of the need for political action and education, and has it been translated into action? If not, why?

The answers to these questions might, in part, produce the solutions to the problems confronting labor's political effort in 1968.

America's school children will be short-changed if GOP tactics prevail in Congress

"It is a time of testing for American education. We must not lose all we have gained by rewriting our laws or by playing for partisan political advantage."

—President Lyndon Johnson, April 28, 1967

House Republicans, led by Minnesota Cong. Albert Quie, are playing with fire again. And if they aren't stopped soon, a lot of American youngsters are going to get burned.

It's no secret that the GOPers have been waiting for a chance to knock big chunks out of President Johnson's Great Society program. But Quie's assault on the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) came as a surprise to Washington legislative experts.

Most Democrats expected the heavy fighting would focus around the controversial poverty program or the model cities bill. Few thought the Republicans would try to make a political football out of federal help for schools.

ESEA was first passed in 1965 by what the President called "the Education Congress." Its passage marked the first time Congress ever voted funds to help local schools solve their financial problems—and many have called it the single, most important law the 89th enacted.

With its passage Congress finally acknowledged that well-educated Americans are essential to the nation's security and the federal government has a duty to expand, improve and help pay for good schools.

In its first year ESEA pumped over a billion dollars into the school districts that needed it most to relieve overcrowded classrooms and beef up understaffed faculties.

In less than two years ESEA has racked up an impressive record. Seven million children from low income families have gotten the extra tutoring they need to make the most of their school years. Forty-nine million youngsters—in virtually every school in the land—have gotten new libraries or books. And ten million more have learned better and faster, while helping to pioneer new teaching methods.

The original bill skillfully steered its way through greatly troubled waters. Every other school-aid bill proposed during the last generation ran afoul of racial and religious antagonisms. ESEA passed because it deals only with entire school districts, and not with individual schools.

Although federal funds are controlled by public officials, parochial schools are eligible for grants if they are located in a district that qualifies for aid. Their needs are included along with the needs of public school children when the district submits its request. This system satisfies those who fear direct grants to religious schools would violate the Constitution's requirement that church and state be separate.

Republicans on the House Education and Labor Committee now propose to replace this flexible, successful compromise with a complicated, inferior plan of giving block school grants to state governments instead of to school districts.

Some observers don't think Quie seriously thought his bill had a chance of passing on the floor. But he suddenly—almost by accident—found himself surrounded by friends.

His approach appeals to southern states' righters and racists because it would weaken federal authority and increase state powers. It also appeals to congressmen who have been conned into backing the Republican tax-sharing schemes which would end most Great Society programs and give their funds directly to the states.

Quie also picked up considerable support by announcing that his plan would provide more money than ESEA does. Stunned Office of Education officials checked his figures—and then got angry. They found Quie had compared his bill's fiscal authorization with what he guesses ESEA might ask for next year.

What northern states would lose

New York	$120 million
Illinois	8 million
California	3 million

"It's like comparing apples with oranges," one OE representative snapped. "And we've had to waste a couple of hectic weeks trying to make sure everyone understands the truth."

The most misleading thing about Quie's figures is that his bill would actually decrease federal school aid by about $300 million next year.

To make matters worse, twenty-five states would receive substantially less under the Quie bill than they now get from ESEA. They include all the southern and border states, except Maryland, and some of our largest and most needy states.

New York, for example, would be the hardest hit, coming out $120 million in the hole. North Carolina and Mississippi would tie for second place, losing about $50 million each.

The current allocation of grant funds would be drastically changed because the Quie bill uses a new formula to America grows—and so do its education problems. Each dollar invested in schools returns ten fold as kids learn—and earn.

determine who gets what. Instead of investing education money in areas where schools are worst, he wants to award grants on the basis of how much total personal income each state has.

Poorer States Lose Out

Not until last week did some of the poorer states realize that this system would shift much of their precious federal allowance to the richer states.

Our parochial schools are also beginning to wake up to the fact that many state governments would give all of Quie's money to public schools. Thirty-five states actually have laws forbidding grants to private or church schools.

What the Quie bill will cost the South

If Congress votes to replace the Elementary and Secondary Education Act with Cong. Quie's proposal, eleven Southern states will lose more than $300 million in federal aid to schools.

Alabama	$32 million	N. Carolina	$50 million
Florida	6 million	S. Carolina	33 million
Georgia	30 million	Tennessee	30 million
Louisiana	19 million	Texas	25 million
Mississippi	48 million	Virginia	13 million
	W. Virginia	$12 million

Other interested groups have pinpointed additional trouble spots if Quie's bill replaces ESEA. Some state education departments are simply not capable of administering so large a program. "Administratively," one government spokesman said, "Quie's bill would throw American education into chaos. It would change all the ground rules and upset patterns of successful innovation and service begun in the past two years."

"And," he added, "school districts won't be able to plan for the future because they won't know until the last minute how much they'll be able to get. ESEA has already worked out a whole chart of entitlements so every district in the country knows how much of the pie it'll get each year."

The Quie proposal would also wipe out several of ESEA's most vital projects. Lost would be the National Teacher Corps, programs for the children of migrant workers, foster children, and American Indians. The new bill would also kill the Defense Department's overseas schools, and end special education for handicapped, neglected or delinquent children.

Another shortcoming in the Quie bill is the fact that only half its money is earmarked for the schools that need it most. ESEA requires that 80 percent be spent in poverty areas. It's interesting to note, however, that even with this stern restriction in the present law, more than 95 percent of our nation's counties are eligible for ESEA grants this year.

Serious Drawback to Cities

Perhaps the serious drawback to the bill, however, is that it offers absolutely no hope or guarantee that cities—where the big education problems fester—will get a fair share of the Quie grants. Most large and medium-sized cities already have a hard time getting along with their small-town-controlled state governments.

Since the governors and state legislators would control school funds under the Quie bill, cities would have to go hat-in-hand to their state capitols—and settle quietly for whatever they get.

Faced with so many disgruntled groups, Cong. Quie last week took some desperate measures to scotch-tape his splintering coalition back together.

He set up a special fund for parochial schools, deleted almost any section of the bill that someone objected to and added almost everything anyone asked to have thrown in.

No one's quite sure what will happen when the bill hits the House floor possibly late next week for action. No major education association favors the Quie amendment and most teachers and school officials say that ESEA has worked well because of the flexibility and freedom it allows local school boards. The Quie bill would let the states control federal money for education as rigidly as they want to.

If the southern Democrats and the Republicans join forces to substitute Quie's bill for the existing law, they may kill federal aid to schools altogether. If Quie's plan is substituted for ESEA, many Catholic congressmen and representatives from the big cities would probably vote against the bill's final passage.

What'll happen to our schools if the Republican wrecking crew wins on this issue? Cong. Joseph Resnick (D-NY) says, "The Quie amendment is based on an old Republican operational philosophy: the people be damned, especially those in need, whether they are in need of education or housing or help.

"As a New York Congressman, I could not possibly vote for this proposal. We cannot hope to achieve New York's educational goals with less money. On this score alone, the Quie amendment would be a catastrophe for education in New York State now and for years to come."

WEEKEND WRAPUP

The war escalates, Congress gropes forward with a host of political hot potatoes, the President's school program gets slapped around by Republicans, Stalin's daughter charms America, George Wallace gets a raucous reception up north. It was that kind of week. . . . Senate critics of escalation spoke out last week making an 11th hour bid for an end to bombing, as General Westmoreland addressed Congress. South Dakota's Sen. McGovern states: "Myself and others have predicted that each new escalation of forces on our part would lead to a further escalation on the other side, thus setting the stage for a larger and bloodier war on the Asian mainland. One of the difficulties in this formula is that in this kind of guerilla war, 10 additional soldiers on our side can be offset by one soldier on the other side, which gives them an enormous advantage in a war of attrition. This is the very course that most of our best generals have warned against for many years." General Westmoreland in an unprecedented personal plea to Congress asked Americans to press on to victory in Vietnam, praising the valor of American troops of all races and creeds. . . . Funny World Department: Notes Jim Wechsler in New York Post: "One evening in Moscow 30 years ago, an American visitor named Norman Thomas attended a ballet. He recalls now that the 12-year-old daughter of Josef Stalin arrived alone and slipped quietly into a box; her father appeared later. Thomas' journey to the Soviet Union was unusual because he had long been an eloquent critic of Stalin's rule—and continued to be. Three decades later there is an even more unusual sequel; his son Evan Thomas, of Harper and Row, will edit Svetlana Stalin's book. Reminiscing about these events, he remarked: 'If people had told me that night that Miss Stalin would come here as a dissident in 1967 and that my son would be her editor, I'd have said they were out of their minds. It's an awfully funny world.'" . . . How much is the oil deplention allowance costing the American taxpayer? New calculations by the staff of the Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation shows that it's depriving the U.S. Treasury of $4 billion a year. That's $4 billion the rest of us dig down in our jeans and pay ourselves. It's utterly disgraceful, and Americans should raise the roof demanding this depletion allowance for wealthy oil companies be wiped out or drastically reduced. $4 billion! We could build a lot of schoolhouses and buy a lot of parks with that. According to Sen. Phil Hart of Michigan a company like Standard Oil of New Jersey had net income of $1.6 billion in 1965 but paid out only 4.9 percent in United States taxes. The normal corporation tax is 52 percent. An ordinary American citizen with $4,000 yearly income pays $800 or 20 percent tax. Is that justice? . . . A Lou Harris poll this year says 77 percent of Americans favor the right to strike, and among union members 84 percent favor the right to strike. Those supporting strikes say, "the strike is the only ultimate weapon of unions, is part of the free union system, and in some cases is the only way to win demands." . . . Congresswoman Julia Hansen of Washington State is the only female member of Congress who's ever served as chairman of a subcommittee handling a bill on the floor of House of Representatives—and last week she came through with flying colors, her Interior Department and related agencies appropriations completely unscathed. An attempt by some Republicans to knock down this budget by 5 percent, willy-nilly, was defeated handily. . . . If you've seen one Redwood, you've seen them all—so said Gov. Ronald Reagan of California during his campaign (and it almost did him in). Those Redwoods are falling to the axes of greedy lumber companies and time is running out to save them. Lumber companies are furiously trying to befuddle the issue, but the fight is on in Congress to save the Redwoods and establish a Redwood National Park. . . . In 9 months with the help of federal voting examiners, 10,000 Negroes in Dallas County, Alabama, got their names on the voting rolls. Until the Civil Rights Act of 1965, only 1515 out of 15,115 were registered to vote, mostly by court decree. Gov. Wallace, please take note.

"THEY'RE SIMPLE, HAPPY FOLK—KNOWLEDGE WOULD JUST CONFUSE THEM"

The Quie bill "would be disastrous for educational advancement in this country. It's a political bill to round up votes. It's jerry-built legislation at its worst."—Cong. Carl Albert

Need letters to Congress to pry loose good bill on Social Security

American workers—young and old alike—have a big stake in what's going on in the House Ways and Means Committee this month. That's where the Social Security amendments of 1967 will come from.

And once the Committee agrees on how much to increase Social Security benefits and coverage, that's it. There can be no changes made on the House floor. Representatives can only vote the bill up or down at that point.

So it's critical for all workers who want financial security in retirement to let their Congressman and the Committee know what needs to be done—before it takes the final vote.

UAW President Walter Reuther said, in his March testimony before the Committee, that "the goal of our Social Security system should be to assure retiring workers a life-time income of two-thirds of their average earnings, with regular increases to keep pace with changing economic conditions."

As a first step toward that goal he proposed an immediate, across-the-board increase of 50 percent in benefit payments. There should also be a guarantee that single retirees and disabled workers will get at least $100 a month, and a minimum of $150 for retired couples.

To pay for part of these increases, President Reuther advanced an idea which has rapidly gained nation-wide support. Instead of socking workers and employers for all the extra money, he asked that the federal government share one-third of the program's total cost by making contributions from its tax receipts and other income.

He also proposed a built-in cost-of-living increase and additional regular benefit hikes so senior citizens can share in America's constantly rising standard of living.

Reuther further asked the Committee to extend Social Security coverage to another 200,000 city workers, 500,000 farm workers and that widows receive 100 percent of their deceased husband's benefits.

"The great fear we have is that some obscure bureaucratic decision will be made and appear casually in the Federal Register which will turn over a trillion dollar asset to private oil companies—and that will be the end of it so far as the American people are concerned"

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, as Vice President of the UAW and a member of our International Executive Board's Committee on Conservation and Natural Resources Development, I am grateful for this opportunity to express the views of our membership on the vast problem of oil shale and the dangers of monopolistic development of this great national treasure.

1) On behalf of the officers of our organization and our membership, let me say we are deeply indebted to you, Senator Hart, and to other members of your subcommittee and to the staff of the subcommittee, for holding these hearings to explore and shed light on the problem presented by this immense resource.

We have followed the testimony of the many expert witnesses you have called and we feel that you are doing a great public service to enlighten the American people on what is at stake in development of oil shale, variously estimated to be worth anywhere from $300 billion to the staggering sum of $2 trillion.

2) The UAW feels that the public interest must be uppermost in any consideration of oil shale.
